Mr. WAGNER submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 34), which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in signing the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway be rescinded, and that in the reenrollment of the said joint resolution the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the following language:

"at a point on Wall Street in the city of New York on the southern boundary of the property belonging to the United States and occupied wholly or partly by the Subtreasury Building, said point lying either at the southwest corner of the Subtreasury Building or in a southerly direction therefrom on a line in prolongation of the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building and extending thence northerly along the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building, or along a line in prolongation thereof, beginning."

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, as bearing upon the pending cruiser bill, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Fort Wayne News Sentinel of Wednesday, January 16, 1929, entitled "Sea Power, Maritime Law, and Cruiser Limitation," and on the same subject a poem entitled "For the Freedom of the Sea," written by Mr. Joseph P. O'Mahony, of Indiana.

There being no objection, the editorial and poem were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News Sentinel, January 16, 1929]

SEA POWER, MARITIME LAW, AND CRUISER LIMITATION

In December, 1915, when the famous triangular controversy with Great Britain and Germany over the rights of neutrals on the high seas was approaching its climax, President Wilson submitted a preparedness program to Congress calling for the construction of 156 naval vessels, to cost $686,000,000. It was the largest naval program that ever had been advanced by an American President. Immediately thereafter President Wilson departed on his tour of the West, with the purpose of rousing the country to the necessity for preparedness and thus bringing pressure upon Congress to enact his naval program.

At St. Louis on February 3, 1916, the President called for the construction by the United States of "incomparably the greatest navy in the world." This phrase was later changed in the official version of the speech to read "incomparably the most adequate navy in the world," but when the program was voted by Congress in August, 1916, little doubt remained as to its purpose. Execution of the program would enable the United States to challenge British naval supremacy and to reassert, with the backing of an "incomparable" sea force, the historic American claim to the "freedom of the seas." The possibility of war with Germany appears to have been omitted from the calculations of the General Board of the Navy at that time, for the 1916 building program was stopped when the United States entered the World War in association with the Allies, and American shipbuilding facilities were turned thereafter to the construction of entirely different types of vessels.

After the war, however, the 1916 program was resumed and the general board advocated such construction as might be necessary to give the United States "a navy equal to the most powerful maintained by any nation in the world." At the same time, it will be remembered, Winston Churchill was warning the British people: "Nothing must lead you to abandon that naval supremacy upon which the life of our country depends."

At the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament in 1921 the United States proposed, and Great Britain accepted, the principle of "equality" or "parity" of strength between the sea forces of the two leading naval powers. It proved possible at that conference, however, to apply the principle only to "capital" ships and aircraft carriers. The United States had intended that it should be applied to all classes of naval vessels, but insuperable obstacles were encountered when it was sought to reach agreement upon limitations to be applied to the construction of submarines and cruisers. Great Britain, remembering her experiences of the World War, was ready to outlaw submarine warfare altogether, and in this she had the support of the United States. But France and Italy balked. As to cruiser strength, an agreement was signed that the individual ship should be limited to a maximum displacement of 10,000 gross tons and should be armed with guns not to exceed 8 inches in caliber; but no agreement was reached as to number of cruisers or total cruiser tonnage.

When the 3-power conference met at Geneva in 1927, with the United States, Great Britain, and Japan participating, the attention of the delegates was concentrated upon cruisers, since President Coolidge's earlier invitation to discuss cruiser parity had been rejected by France and Italy. When the British and American delegates sat down to discuss cruiser limitation it was inevitable that each side should consider the problem from the standpoint of its own war experience. Great Britain's preponderance in cruiser strength had enabled her to destroy the enemy's commerce, control the commerce of neutrals, and give protection to her own sea lanes for the transportation of munitions and food supplies. The United States, prior to its entrance into the war, had been compelled to submit to interferences with its neutral commerce which it deemed to be in violation of international law and which many of its leaders believed would not have occurred if it had possessed a fleet adequate to afford protection to its proper interests on the high seas.

In the condition of uncertainty surrounding international maritime law—holding out to each nation an invitation to interpret the law to suit its own requirements—it was natural that the delegates of Great Britain and the United States each should seek so to shape the proposed agreement as to leave its own nation the better circumstanced to assert and maintain its own conceptions of neutral and belligerent rights at sea in time of war. The delegates at Geneva were not authorized to discuss or define the purposes for which cruisers might be used in times of war, but were commissioned merely to negotiate agreements on "types and tonnages." The logical outcome of the position in which they found themselves was a deadlock—and a deadlock was not long in developing.

This made it apparent to President Coolidge that "no agreement can be reached which will be inconsistent with a considerable building program on our part." President Coolidge and President-elect Hoover are both said to regard the administration's building program as authorizing the absolute minimum of new vessels required for national defense. In his address accepting the Republican presidential nomination Mr. Hoover said: "We must and shall maintain our naval defense and our merchant marine in the strength and efficiency which will yield us at all times the primary assurance of liberty."

Since the days of antiquity rights at sea have been a fruitful source of controversy and a frequent cause of armed hostilities. In Plutarch's Lives it is related that Pericles "introduced a bill" providing that all Hellenes resident in Europe and Asia "should be invited to send deputies to a conference at Athens * * * to deliberate concerning the sea, that all might sail it fearlessly and keep the peace." The first important compilation of maritime law was the Consolato del Mar, published at Barcelona in 1494. Numerous attempts have since been made in international conferences and treaty agreements to establish the rights of neutrals and belligerents at sea in time of naval warfare, but the rights enjoyed by neutrals throughout the greater part of the world's history have been mainly limited to those conceded or enforced by the power that has happened at the outbreak of hostilities to find itself in control of the seas. For the present, until the other powers disarm, considerations of world peace demand that we build up to parity with Britain in cruiser strength.

FOR THE FREEDOM OF THE SEA

(Dedicated to the Members of the United States Senate and Congress who are standing loyally by the 15 cruiser bill and insist on the proper naval defense of the United States)

By Joseph P. O'Mahony

They shall not close the seas again
And bar "Old Glory's" way.
In peaceful commerce on the main,
Where freedom should hold sway,
They shall not make our standard "dip"
At their austere decree;
We'll match their challenge "ship for ship"
For the freedom of the sea.

If they love peace and seek good will
For every race and clime,
We've led the way—we're ready still
To reach that goal sublime.
We have the power, the means, the men,
To guard our legacy;
We did of old, and can again,
Force freedom of the sea.

But others, false to every trust,
Have trampled pacts of peace,
And gorged with conquest's greed and lust,
Their war drums never cease.
An empire's flag for pelf and gain,
Proclaimed that none were free
To use God's highways on the main
And sail the chainless sea.

They robbed the poor, the brave, the good,
And starved the weak and old,
To grab the soil and seize the food
In their mad rush for gold.
And thus they dragged in freemen's sons
To fight at their decree,
Because we lacked the ships and guns
To keep God's oceans free.

And now, our slogan rings once more
To let the wide world know
The standard that our fathers bore
Will quail before no foe.
We strive for peace, but honor's way
Our Nation's path must be,
And pressing on we stand for aye!
For the freedom of the sea.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from California will proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is my desire to indulge in some passing observations upon the pending cruiser bill. Coming from the territory from which I come, of course, I am in favor of the measure. Realizing as I do what the future may hold for that territory, I desire the bill in its present form, notwithstanding any edicts or commands that may be put upon this body, to be passed and to be passed so that we may enter upon the small and modest naval program that is ours.

Mr. President, as one practically of the first generation of the West that is now coming into its own, I have dreamed of the future of that territory. It has been no iridescent dream, sir, of what the years may hold for the Pacific coast. Three great States upon the Pacific Ocean, the frontier of occidental civilization, hold in their future a prosperity and greatness that can not be compared, in my opinion, with the prospects of any other part of the universe; three great States that the Creator has blessed with manifold advantages; three great States that mark an empire, an empire second to none in all the world!

Of the first generation, as I am, in one of those States, I have seen the marvelous advance and the marvelous progress that has been made there. I have seen from its small beginning the State from which I come grow to be now the fifth State in this Union in population. I have seen there one city which I used to visit when it had less than 12,000 people become the fourth city in the United States. I live upon a harbor incomparable either in its useful purposes or its beauty. From my porch I look out through the Golden Gate, and far beyond I can envisage another land and another people, a people that yet we know little of, and lands that in their productivity, in their resources, and their possibilities, we little understand. I realize—and it is, indeed, not as a prophet that I speak, but from the irrefutable logic of present events—that it will be only a brief period as the lives of nations are measured until the world's drama will be played upon the great Pacific Ocean.

I can recall the historic days, far, far past, when a little bit of the Ægean Sea represented the commerce of the world; how then it enlarged in the Mediterranean; then how the Hanseatic towns took their toll of commerce of the world then existing. The North Sea then came into its own, superseded by the Atlantic. The day is coming, sir—it is coming not in my lifetime but in the life, perhaps, of my grandchildren living to-day—the day is coming when the world's drama and the world's chief activity will be upon the Pacific Ocean. A thousand miles and more of coast have we in California; a like amount almost in the two States immediately north of us; harbors there unexcelled; and harbors there from which an ever-growing world commerce goes forth to-day over the Pacific Ocean and into lands that but recently have been explored by commerce.

The watchword of the present administration of the United States has been prosperity; the keystone of the incoming administration of the United States, if we may judge by what has been said and done thus far, will be prosperity and trade; and I take it that the recent voyage made by the newly elected President of the United States into South America was taken with one purpose, at least, and perhaps the dominant purpose, of increasing trade for the United States of America. Commerce we seek, not because alone it is the lifeblood of a nation, but because the productivity of this land of ours presses upon any barriers that we might seek to erect, and plunges through those barriers seeking outlet in the marts of the world, in commerce and in trade. Remember, sir, always the spirit of commerce, after all, is the spirit of conquest—peaceful conquest, if you desire to put it so, but it is conquest nevertheless.

To-day our imports and our exports exceed those of any other nation on the face of the earth. Our country is so situated, like a maritime island, that we more readily than any other nation may go into every continent, take there our goods, and return with those things that we require. Our economic productivity about equals that of all the nations of Europe west of Russia, on the one hand, and that of all the other parts of the world, upon the other. This colossal economic force expresses itself in overseas trade. Our external trade to-day is already as world-wide and as great as that of any other single country. Our exports are already over 20 per cent greater than those of any other one nation, and their production is claimed to support approximately one-tenth of our population.

Exports and imports exceeding in value $10,000,000,000 a year of necessity require shipping facilities. In turn those shipping facilities and this commerce in excess of $10,000,000,000 a year require naval power to safeguard them. The sequence of sea power is production, overseas trade, shipping, and then wisdom demands the support of naval power for protection. How blind are we to the story of the world if we do not afford that adequate protection! How little we understand the tale that all history tells to us! Commercial supremacy led to the domination of the sea from the days of Tyre through the eras of supremacy of the Greeks, the Romans, the Venetians, the Genoese, the Dutch, the French, and the English. In peace the conflict may be asserted to be economic, but economic success invariably brings envy and hostility. The nation striving for economic supremacy must be prepared to defend its position or yield its commercial preeminence.

We require ships to carry this commerce that is the lifeblood of our Nation, and a ship is to-day a rather delicate thing. A ship is not merely a ship, not merely a great floating wagon; a ship to-day is an emblem of sensitive sovereignty; and ships are required to carry our trade, and then power upon the ocean is demanded to protect that trade.

Remember the story that has gone down resounding through the centuries whenever trade supremacy has been challenged upon the sea. We recall that the Phœnicians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, and Carthaginians yielded alike to Rome, and yielded because of the sea power of Rome. Hannibal's campaign might have had a different termination had Hannibal and Carthage had the ships to carry their men over instead of having to make the long march that was necessary to come into Italy. The lack of ships saved Rome and defeated Hannibal. Then, as the years have gone by, successively we have seen the Venetians and the Genoese falling before the hardy seamen of the north; and Spain, with unrivaled riches and colonies, the Dutch with their thrift and their energy and their industry, France, magnificent in daring, each challenging the supremacy on the sea of Britain, and each at the end yielding to Britain's superior might and power.

The fall of Napoleon, the greatest of all commanders—indeed, as an administrator, in my opinion, second to none—was due to Britain's sea power; and Meredith said, and said truly, that the last great fight of Nelson "drove the smoke of Trafalgar to darken the blaze of Austerlitz." The last great war doubtless had its roots in trade rivalries and the desire for trade supremacy.

I recall these things but sketchily and hastily that if we have any vision in this body at all we may prepare for the days to come. Either, sir, yield what is now the fundamental principle of this Government in this material epoch, the idea of making money and increasing trade and commerce—yield it, or be prepared to protect that which is insisted upon and that which our ruling power has charted as the course of this great Republic. One or the other must result. We must be prepared to defend our dominance upon the sea in its carrying trade, in the commerce that we have upon the world's highway, or we must cease our efforts and yield the commercial supremacy we have won.

I do not favor this bill, sir, because Great Britain has built certain cruisers and will build more; I do not favor this bill, sir, in order that we may enter into competition with any nation on the face of the earth in building battleships or cruisers; I favor it, sir, because, as an American looking at the past and thinking of the future and what the future holds for us, it is obvious, except to the man with a mental strabismus, that we must be prepared to hold our own and protect that for which we are striving and for which this Nation has burst its bonds and gone upon the seas to seek. I prefer, sir, not to suggest that this bill is a measure to do one thing or another thing to Britain; I prefer, sir, to put my advocacy solely upon the ground that America requires certain cruisers for American protection and, requiring those cruisers, demanding that protection, I would accord it in the small measure—too small, in my opinion—that is proposed.

They cry out at us, some of our brethren in this country, that we are entering into competition with nations abroad, and particularly Great Britain. Some say we build alone against Great Britain. Others assert that we make more possible war by building vessels of the sort that we seek under this bill to construct.

Where were these voices, sir; where were these gentlemen who cry out against 15 cruisers for the United States when Britain was building in the years following the disarmament conference in Washington, building in defiance of the spirit of the disarmament treaty the cruisers that she now has in greater number than we can hope to reach in a number of years to come? I did not hear the American voices then crying out that Britain was in a competitive race. I heard no hysterical women's organizations who now say to us here that we ought not to indulge in the construction of a single cruiser because we thereby are becoming militaristic, imperialistic, and inviting strife and war—I heard none of them then criticize Great Britain. I hear none of them now.

Where were all of these organizations—where the voices that have come to us in this Chamber against a program that is so modest, indeed, that the most pacific can indulge in it and consent to it—where were they a few years ago when Britain began her building program and began it under a labor government?

I do not take, sir, in very good temper the remarks that have come to us from some gentlemen abroad about the unfortunate thing that we are doing in building these cruisers. I read the other day the article appearing in the New York World, of Mr. Ramsay MacDonald. I thought as I read between the lines that possibly he was shedding tears at the awfulness of the course of the United States of America in building 15 cruisers under a very modest program, less than the program in existence of Great Britain. I recalled that five cruisers, built in defiance of the spirit of the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armaments, were built under this distinguished gentleman himself, representing the Labor Party of Great Britain; and while he may say that the forces within the Empire were so powerful as to drive him on to that objective, the fact that he did go on to that objective should have caused him to refrain from lecturing the United States of America in the building of 15 cruisers.

Let us go back and look for a moment upon the disarmament conference. Let us look for a moment upon the British program. It has been asked here, "Against whom do we build?" I answer, "Against nobody. We build for ourselves as we please for the protection of the United States of America." But who asked the question a few years ago, when Britain began to build these cruisers, "Against whom do you build?" And why should Americans ever be so delicate in their susceptibilities that they must criticize and cavil at the slightest effort on the part of their Nation to protect itself, and view always with equanimity and acquiescence any effort that is made by any other nation?

But there is, sir, running through all the efforts at naval limitation a perfectly obvious purpose on the part of Britain that marks itself in such a fashion as not only to justify the present naval program, but to justify a program far in excess of that.

You recall, of course, the disarmament conference, and what occurred. I do not intend to go into detail in respect to it; but, sir, to use a colloquialism, we were bamboozled in that conference. We went into it with the thrill that we always have and that is preached to our people and our children concerning altruism and the desire to prevent future wars. We went into it with the thought that we were going to reach a limitation of armaments upon the sea; and we believed, of course, with the peculiar credulity that attaches to American officialdom, that everybody else believed exactly as we believed. We went into it with a superiority so marked in great battleships that no other country on the face of the earth could hope to compete with it. We sacrificed that in which we were superior. We accepted a mathematical parity with Great Britain, and a ratio of 5 to 3 with Japan; and we left that conference in the high hope that forever we had prevented any further race in armament upon this earth.

In the last speech that was made by the president of the American delegation he used these words; mark them now, and then think of what has transpired since. As the conference adjourned, he spoke with his usual eloquence and ability, and he said:

> This treaty ends, absolutely ends, the race in competitive naval armaments.

And then there were salvos of applause; tears doubtless were shed, for had we not forever ended the race in competitive naval armaments?

After the applause had subsided, he continued:

> At the same time, it leaves the relative security of the great naval powers unimpaired.

Do you know, sir, whence came the first suggestion for the Limitation of Armaments Conference? It came, sir, from Great Britain. Great Britain was probably little interested in the size of our Army. She was much interested in the merchant service and the Navy, both of which it was important to the Empire to see reduced. Accordingly—and follow the sequence of events—in the spring of 1920 the First Lord of the Admiralty announced as a national policy that it would be content with a 1-power navy. The meaning of this was that in answer to Germany's growing naval power it had been the policy of Great Britain to maintain what it called a 2-power navy; that is to say, content to build equal to the combined navies of the two great naval powers. Now the German Navy was destroyed, and the American Navy was far outbuilding the English.

The announcement from the British Government in March, 1920, brought no immediate reply from Mr. Wilson. In the fall of 1920, when Parliament met, the First Lord of the Admiralty went a step farther. He announced that they hoped to get a call for a conference on the limitation of armaments from the United States of America; and in pursuance of that call, and the suggestion that emanated from Great Britain, our disarmament conference was held.

Sacrificing as we did $150,000,000, sacrificing as we did ships that were the peer of any that had ever been constructed before, sacrificing as we did our superiority upon the seas, then we expected that the ratio of 5–5–3 would be preserved, and that no nation would be more desirous of preserving that parity than Great Britain herself. Immediately afterwards, however, Great Britain begins feverishly to build her cruisers. Immediately thereafter Japan begins to build her cruisers. We stand mute and silent, surprised at first at the result of our generosity, and then shocked into a realization that our sacrifices had been in vain, and that the naval parity of 5–5–3 was a mere fraud, a delusion, and a snare.

The English thereafter started on their program; and solely because the book in question is one that has been cited by the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee as an authority, while not admitting the authority, I read a bit from it in regard to the British position.

Kenworthy and Young, in the book that has just been published, called The Freedom of the Seas, thus set forth the result of the disarmament conference:

> The belief of the man in the street—

> especially in America, was that the principle of parity had been established and that equal navies in all respects would be maintained as between Britain and America, with a smaller ratio for France and Japan. It had soon to be recognized that Great Britain would construe this treaty strictly and would observe its provisions rather than its principles. The British were prepared to accept parity in capital ships because competition with America was hopeless owing to the tremendous cost of these leviathans—£7,000,000 to £9,000,000 each. It was useless in the view of many British naval experts, including some high naval authorities, on the ground that the day of the great battleship was over. As to the submarines the British, whether of the new or old school, had no use for a weapon whose principal use was commerce destruction, and whose secondary use against surface warships threatened to put them out of business altogether. The British experts were, however, arguing to themselves thus:

This is Commander Kenworthy, of the British Parliament, writing:

> The battleship is too blown upon to be worth bothering about, and we can't compete in them on account of cost—let us therefore accept parity there. The submarine and airplane are new-fangled, noxious weapons that knock the bottom out of our strategy and tactics—let us prohibit them, or at least prevent their use as far as possible. But in cruisers we can compete. In that weapon we enjoy the accumulative expertize and experience of two centuries of sea supremacy. And our commerce and coast protection require that we should retain that supremacy.

By the grace of God—

Writes Kenworthy; far be it from me to reecho his words at all—

By the grace of God and President Harding, Britannia may still rule the waves. So when it came to cruisers the British representatives had insisted at Washington, with success, on no limit being placed to the number that could be built. The Americans consented, considering that parity was accepted in the primary weapon—battleships—and in principle; but they imposed limitation in size and gun power of cruisers.

There is the story of what happened, indeed, at the disarmament conference of 1921–22. Britain came, of course, with those sweet words with which we became familiar during the war. Oh, how I remember them as if they were yesterday, when the distinguished gentleman who came for the disarmament conference and led British diplomacy spoke to us from that platform beautiful language, soft and sweet, and how he talked to us during the war about what was to be done, and how that war was being fought to free peoples held in subjection, and that democracy might be saved and justice might prevail in all this world, with treaties in his pockets at the time dividing up much of the earth's surface!

I recall during the disarmament conference whenever a question arose, in the language of diplomacy, in that charming and delightful fashion that was his, he would say, "We agree in principle," and we would accept his word as conclusive upon the ultimate event. They agreed in principle with us in 1921 and 1922, they agreed in principle with us until we had destroyed our superiority, and thereafter they began to build, in the fashion with which we are familiar, and began to build just as they chose.

I recall these facts to the Senate, not because I desire a naval race with Great Britain; I care not for that; but that you may understand some of the voices that are raised in the United States of America to-day against this country entering upon any building program at all for its own self-defense and its own self-preservation.

I reiterate, I want no competitive building with Great Britain; I want no competitive building with any nation. I make the comparisons, of course, because those comparisons are ready at hand, and I recall the events of the happenings of the disarmament conference and subsequently that we may keep our eyes open in extending our hands in a desire to every nation on the face of the earth to disarm and limit naval power. I desire that while extending our hands we may understand just exactly how we have been dealt with in the past and what the possibilities are of how we may be dealt with in the future.

Parity, of course, we assumed we had after the disarmament conference of 1922. Parity to-day British statesmen reecho and have reechoed in the last few months. But we need to read only the proceedings of the Geneva conference, when we sought again a naval limitation agreement, to understand exactly what the British were endeavoring to do with the parity that we were assured was ours in the disarmament conference where we made all the sacrifices and they made none.

There is another reason, sir, I say in passing, and in diversion for the moment, why this bill must be passed if we believe in a limitation of naval armament. After the debate that has been had upon this bill, after the propaganda that has spread over this Nation with respect to our building program, if you defeat this bill or eliminate the prime provisions, you can not expect that you will be taken at your word in anything you seek to do in a disarmament convention hereafter, because your bargaining power will have gone. It might not have been so if we had not had the debate which has occurred upon this measure, but if you believe in bargaining power, concerning which I care nothing at all, then you must pass this measure in the form in which it is, or these gentlemen, who are very wide awake and who do not always indulge in the dreams that are ours as to future peace, will take us just exactly as they have taken us in the past, and our hopes of future disarmament upon the sea will go aglimmering.

We came to another disarmament conference at Geneva. We imagined when we went there that we would be enabled to accomplish something, perhaps, such as we had accomplished in the Washington disarmament conference. In Washington, with everything to give, they accepted our generous anxiety to sacrifice. In Geneva, where we had nothing to bargain with at all, and with the superiority lodged with those who sat there with us, they would yield nothing at all.

Parity, they say now, is ours. It was not so a very little time ago. It was not so at the time of the meeting of the Geneva conference. There, among those who represented Britain, was the age-old idea that has been expressed by every Briton in power from time immemorial, the idea that was that of Winston Churchill and expressed by him with such force after the war. It was a question at Washington of yielding where the superior power existed. It was a question at Washington of limitation because Britain could not hope to equal us, but back in the heads of Britons for all the years had been the one thought among those in power in England, expressed just after the Great War by Churchill in these words:

Nothing in the world, nothing that you may think of or dream of, or anyone may tell you; no arguments, however specious, no appeals, however seductive, must lead you to abandon that naval supremacy on which the life of our country depends.

That has been their view in the past. It may be modified by the exigencies of the very present day. It was not modified when our people met them at Geneva for the purpose of further limiting armaments upon the seas.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take it it has not been modified yet. I saw in the papers just a few days ago excerpts from speeches made by Sir Austen Chamberlain, in which he practically restated that very doctrine and said that they had no further proposals on cruiser reduction to make.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I rather took the speech of Chamberlain to mean that he accepted parity at this moment. But I may have been in error in my understanding of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I took it to mean that he accepted the kind of parity they got in the disarmament conference of 1922.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have not a doubt that if we meet again that is the kind of parity they will get. There is something strange about our diplomacy. I am very fond of it. For those in charge of it, of course, I have the highest regard and respect, but I would infinitely rather it would not deal with very delicate questions in which our defense may be involved with foreign nations.

I realize, of course, that it will do all that is essential for America, and that it seeks by the very best methods that it can employ, and with an ability which I will admit is without stint and without qualification and unexcelled, what is best for our country, but somehow or other, whenever we deal diplomatically with our brethren abroad, we get the same sort of result that we got from the disarmament conference in Washington.

Let us turn to the Geneva conference, which was just a brief period ago. This is what our English brethren, Kenworthy and Young, say of that:

It seemed at first sight indeed unreasonable that America should dictate to the British what the size and strength of their cruisers should be. But if we look a little deeper into the meaning of Mr. Bridgeman's proposals—

Mr. Bridgeman is the First Lord of the Admiralty—

we find that there was some excuse for the American suspicion that this simple country gentleman, with his twinkling blue eyes and genial air, could stack the cards in his own favor and slip in a joker with the best of them. His smile was disarming; but his disarming went no deeper than his smile.

I would like to read some chapters from Kenworthy and Young, but I read just a word or two as to why the Geneva conference collapsed. After the British delegates had been at Geneva for a brief period they were suddenly called home, and they were called home at the most critical time of the negotiations. Being called home at that time was ascribed by Cecil as one of the contributing causes of the failure, but Kenworthy says:

The revolt of the Admiralty and of authoritative opinion in the ruling class against the principle of parity has been carried into the Conservative cabinet. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Churchill, was recognized as a recruit to this revolt, when, in a speech at the Mansion House (July 12, 1927), he said, at a critical stage of the conference:

"I should regard it as the paramount duty of the British exchequer, in priority to all other considerations, to find any money that was really needed to safeguard those sea-borne food supplies without which neither the life nor the independence of the British nation could continue."

Just a word about the sea-borne supplies of Britain. What he means, and what the argument there always is, is that Britain needs a large navy—indeed, a navy that is supreme upon the sea—because Britain is required to safeguard certain sea lanes. Do you know what those sea lanes are? They are the recognized lanes upon the sea of every nation on the face of the earth; and when they say that they must safeguard those sea lanes, what they mean is that no sea lane over which ocean commerce passes shall be permitted to exist unless commanded by British power. That has been their insistence, and it was their insistence in 1922; because in the disarmament conference of that year not only did we give them our capital ships, that were so superior to theirs, but we left them with 10 per cent superiority in capital ships over us; we left them their bases in the sea, the bases which are necessary for their ships.

We left them not only a superiority in battleships, but we left them as well their superiority in cruisers which then existed; and not only that, but we destroyed by treaty the only possibility that we had in the far Pacific of a naval base for an American fleet. We yielded everything, as was so eloquently said by the Senator from Missouri yesterday. We yielded all to them upon the hope that we would have a true disarmament.

They, on the contrary, yielded, only from necessity, the parity in the great vessels of war, but yielded nothing else at all. When afterwards we sought to have parity in cruisers, then came the Geneva fiasco. We will have parity with Britain, sir, just in one way. We will have parity with Britain when we build up to what Great Britain has and are ready to build beyond what Great Britain now has. So if we stress parity in this matter at all, that is the only direction in which it will ever be obtained.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not want to interrupt the Senator if it will at all disturb him, but he is speaking of the question of parity. On March 16, 1922, I called attention to the fact that we were not receiving parity.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let me say to the Senator from Missouri that I want to yield to him this meed of praise, and he is entitled to it from the Senate and from the country. He is the only man upon the floor of the Senate who saw what was happening in 1922—saw it with a vision so clear that I wonder now at the prophecy that was his, which has been borne out by subsequent events.

Mr. REED of Missouri. All I wanted to call attention to was this one fact which I called attention to at that time, that the British ships were measured by British rules and went into the treaty in accordance with that measurement. American ships were measured by American rules and went into the treaty according to that measurement. The result was that a British ship and an American ship of exactly the same inches did not show the same tonnage, the British ship showing about 20 per cent less tonnage than the American, and that brought the result which I stated at that time in this language:

> Accordingly the total British tonnage allowed by the treaty as to existing ships will be 628,820 tons, as against America's 525,860 tons, a difference of 20 per cent in favor of Great Britain.

In addition to that was the question of speed and of gun power, which was fully gone into.

Since the Senator paid me a very handsome compliment, for which I thank him, let me say that I am entitled to no credit for those figures. They were furnished me by the experts of the Navy. They were denied subsequently upon the floor of the Senate by a very distinguished Senator who undoubtedly was misled, because he was incapable of a deliberate misstatement. I believe they are now admitted to be true. So that I think in this discussion we ought to understand that we never had a parity, even disregarding the question of the cruisers that are being built.

I thank the Senator for permitting me to make the statement.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are we to understand that our naval experts were unaware of the fact to which the Senator calls attention, or that our commissioners, being fully advised about the matter, consented, while representing to the people of the United States that parity had been obtained so far as capital ships were concerned, realizing that Great Britain had an advantage of 20 per cent?

Mr. REED of Missouri. The only way I can answer that question in justice to myself and everybody else is to say that a gentleman came to my office and made the statement to me that this was the situation. I did not take his statement as correct, although I believed him to be a truthful man. I asked the then commander of the Navy for a verification. He sent a man to my office with the information that he was one of their best experts. I gave him the figures. He checked them and said they were accurate except in one respect, and in that one respect the error was in favor of Great Britain and not in our favor; that is, the case was stronger than it had been put.

I thereupon took the floor in the Senate and put the tables into the RECORD, with a prolonged speech to which nobody listened. That is all I can say about it. I do know that afterwards one of the Senators who was on the conference said I was mistaken; that there had been a reconciliation of the measurements; but I afterwards took the pains to get the British book which publishes their official figures, published a year or two years later than the treaty, and the measurements put into the treaty were the measurements given in the book.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suppose everyone will appreciate the tremendous significance and importance of the statements now made by the Senator from Missouri. The commissioners of the United States represented to the Senate of the United States in their report that parity had been secured, with just a variation which was explained. We are now told that that representation was not correct; that, as a matter of fact, the British had an advantage, so far as capital ships retained were concerned, of 20 per cent over the United States.

That is either an impeachment of the integrity and capacity of the naval experts and advisers of the American commission, or it is an indictment of the integrity of the American commissioners themselves, because, if that is true, of course, it became the duty of the naval experts and advisers to advise the commissioners, and if they discharged their duty they must have realized that there was an advantage of 20 per cent in the case of Great Britain, and yet they represented to the Senate and to the country that parity had been secured.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me to enable me to explain the matter?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the matter can be very easily explained without impeaching the British Government or impeaching our commissioners. There is a difference in the method of measurement. Great Britain fixes her measurements when she first prepares to build her ships. They are to be built for certain weights and certain displacements. A ship is always carried in their book at that designed or intended weight. The actual weight usually exceeds the designed or intended weight. We measure everything by displacement; that is, the weight displaced when we are armed, with everything except coal and material of that kind. Our displacement is measured as the ship is on the line of battle.

At the disarmament conference, of course, it was necessary to ascertain whether the British ships carried what they called a legend, because it is more or less imaginative, and whether they really gave the size and tonnage of their ships. The record will show that the British commissioners told us frankly and candidly exactly what was the real weight of their ships or displacement of their ships, ton for ton.

Our commissioners knew what it was exactly in displacement, in size, and how it was treated. They had, as they understood, that excess. The question arose as to how that could be gotten rid of so there would be an equality. At that conference we compelled them to adopt in an agreement the American method of measuring the tonnage of ships, and that is in the Washington conference proceedings.

Mr. HALE. For the future.

Mr. SWANSON. Their future displacement.

Mr. REED of Missouri. For the future!

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; for the future. The commissioners told me and the naval officers told me that some of those ships must be replaced after they had passed 20 or 25 years in age. There was no apprehension of any trouble in the next six or seven years, but when the replacement takes place, on account of the ships' age being exceeded in that way, then the actual parity will be established.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Exactly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want the Senator to explain why the British had 22 and America only 18 if they were on a parity and the British ships were larger than the American ships.

Mr. SWANSON. As to capital ships, they had the advantage stated by the Senator from Missouri, and the British told them what advantage they had.

Mr. HALE. They did not have to tell them. Our people were familiar with their ships and their people were familiar with our ships.

Mr. SWANSON. We can not tell the weight of the ship by the material that is put into it. They measure the displacement and the weight is fixed on what the ship will show in the way of displacement in line of battle. England frankly told the size of her ships. We told exactly what our ships were in tonnage. They have what they call the legend weight. A ship is built or intended to be built at 40,000 tons, though it might actually be 42,000 tons, but they carry it at 40,000 tons. That was understood at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to say one word myself in response to the Senator from Montana. I do not know whether he challenges the statement I made about 10 per cent. If he does, I am ready to establish it by authority hereafter, and will do so. Without impugning the integrity of anybody on earth, I say that as a matter of fact the ultimate result was that Britain had about 10 per cent more in capital ships.

Mr. SWANSON. That is true. It was understood by the commission at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON. It may be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not controvert that statement at all, because the actual aggregate of tonnage is given right in the treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cited that as an instance of our generosity in the disarmament conference.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The actual tonnage of Great Britain was, as the Senator said, about 10 per cent greater than ours. It was explained at the time that that was accounted for by the age of the ships and by other considerations.

Mr. JOHNSON. That may be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I make no question about that. I do not controvert that question at all. Neither do I question the statement made by the Senator from California. But the statement of the Senator from Missouri is essentially different from that. He said that there is still a variation of 20 per cent in addition by reason of the difference in the method of computing the tonnage of ships, and that while it was represented to us that this was the tonnage, as a matter of fact upon the American system of computation the English strength was 20 per cent greater.

Mr. REED of Missouri. In order to get this in an accurate way—and I am very much interested in having it accurate—my statement was that there was a difference of approximately 20 per cent in the tonnage, and that there was a difference in the actual tonnage, and that was a difference in favor of Great Britain. I am not differentiating between the allowance of 10 or 12 per cent, which was just spoken of, and the total.

This is what I understand to be the case since the statement of the Senator from Virginia has been made. Taking the British figures which embrace the British measurements, it was recognized that there was a difference between the actual tonnage and the apparent tonnage which was represented by the two sets of figures.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say the position I take is that there was a difference; but the British actual displacement always exceeds what they carry on their books as to the actual tonnage. As to the figures referred to by the Senator from Maine, I can not state the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has the exact figures here, and he can give them to the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. But, Mr. President, before the Senator from Maine gives those figures, may I say that that is a question that we have had up in all the contests we have had with Great Britain as to maritime matters. Even in the international yacht races the question always arises about the relative measurement by the British standard and the relative measure by the American standard, and under the British standard the net tonnage is always much more than ours.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I want to finish my statement, if the Senator from California will permit me to do so. This question may come up in the months in the future when I am not here, and I do not want any misunderstanding.

My statement was that the British measured their ships by a certain rule and the Americans measured their ships by a different rule; that when tonnage represented by the British rule was compared with the tonnage represented by the American rule if that tonnage were equal in figures the British ship was approximately 20 per cent heavier than the American ship.

Now the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has stated that in part that was taken care of by considering the question of obsolescence in certain of the British vessels and that the remainder of the difference is to be taken care of in the future by hereafter balancing the two measurements exactly. That, therefore, does not conflict with anything I have said, and does not destroy the present effect of these figures.

If the Senator from California will pardon me one word further, so that I may be understood fully, let me say that my understanding is that when a British vessel is measured as to its tonnage it is upon its trial trip; but in the English trial trips the vessel is very lightly loaded, and, therefore, sits well on the top of the water, whereas an American vessel in its trial trips is loaded practically as it would be for a long cruise or for general service, and it sits deep in the water; so that two vessels of the same size bring this result: The one sitting on top of the water displaces only a small amount of water, which is the tonnage—the tonnage being the amount of water displaced—while the vessel that is put down deep into the water displaces a larger tonnage. Accordingly, an American vessel of a certain number of feet and inches, loaded as we load it, will displace a tonnage much greater than a British vessel of the same feet and inches loaded as the British load it.

Now, when we wrote this treaty we put into the treaty the English measurements as recorded in the English books. There may have been some——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I will yield in a moment—there may have been some adjustment as to obsolescence; there may have been some adjustment as to the future; but the figures which I have given were checked by an expert of the Navy as correct, and the tonnage was—

Great Britain, 628,820.

In opposition to the treaty I complained of that item at the time.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the position I take is this: I am satisfied the representatives of Great Britain did not conceal in any way whatever the tonnage of their ships. That statement is in accordance with the information furnished me, and that information was supplied by a naval officer. The British representatives stated frankly the weight and displacement on both bases. As I understand, the displacement of an American vessel is measured with everything on board, including guns, as the vessel is ready for battle at sea, less possibly coal, and I do not know definitely as to that, and less water for operation. The English have what they call a legend tonnage, which, as I understand, is the tonnage computed as of the time when the ship was actually designed. However, the agreement absolutely fixed for the future the American method of counting tonnage, and I do not think, as I have said, that the British concealed anything, according to the information furnished to me by those who actually participated in the conference. Possibly the figures which have been given were obtained from those furnished by the British, but I am satisfied that they made no concealment as to their ships.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is quite right; there was no concealment on the part of the British about the tonnage of their ships. In computing tonnage of the battleships at the time, both those of Great Britain and our own, we took the so-called legend tonnage, the design tonnage, which was estimated when the ships were originally constructed. We assess such design tonnage in one way—the British assess it in another. The figures that were given were based on what was done in the ordinary way of assessing this tonnage in each country. Reduced to the basis of standard tonnage, without fuel and without reserve feed water, the British at the present time would have 606,850 tons, with the changes that they have made in regard to blisters on their ships, and we would have 519,553 tons, which is an even greater discrepancy than appeared at the time.

But as I have said, Mr. President, our people knew about the British ships and the British knew about our ships. We had competent naval officers assigned to the duty of looking into this whole matter; and if we did not get a battleship force that was equal to that of Great Britain it was our own fault. We got the force that was agreed upon by our own representatives.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. There are a great many matters that have got to be taken into consideration in arriving at an equality between the two fleets. It must be remembered that four of the British ships are not battleships at all; they are battle cruisers; and battle cruisers can not stand up against battleships; they have not the same armor that the battleships have; they are faster ships, but they can not stand up against battleships. Then the question of age of the ships and the efficiency of the ships and the gun power of the ships, and many other questions, must be taken into consideration. Taking all things into consideration, it was held by our people and by the British that we had a battle fleet that was substantially on a par with theirs.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to another feature——

Mr. HALE. I have merely enumerated a few; there are plenty of others.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Take the American battleships. There are the Maryland of 32,600 tons; the California of 32,300 tons; the Tennessee of 32,300 tons; the Idaho of 32,000 tons; the New Mexico of 32,000 tons; the Mississippi of 32,000 tons; the Arizona of 31,400 tons; the Pennsylvania of 31,400 tons. The British had no ships at all equal to those.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is wrong as to that. Under the standard——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Wait a moment.

Mr. HALE. Under the standard tonnage on which the figures are now computed on the same basis as ours the British have battle cruisers, the Hood, 42,100 tons; the Repulse, 32,000 tons; the Renown, 32,000 tons; the Valiant, the Queen Elizabeth, and the Warspite, of 31,000 tons; and the Barham and Malaya, of 31,000 tons.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I was speaking about the capital ships that became the subject of controversy.

Mr. HALE. These are the capital ships of the British Navy which I have just given.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They were all listed in the book, and the ships the Senator has named are not listed at all.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is wrong.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have the treaty before me.

Mr. HALE. But I think the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not think there is any such possibility. Under the heading, "Ships that may be retained by the British Empire"——

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there appears to be a considerable difference of opinion. The statement is made on the one hand of a fact and a different statement on the other, and the Senators can settle it, I think, while I proceed, if they do not mind.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thought the Senator from Missouri had finished and there was developing a conflict of fact between the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Montana——

Mr. HALE. No; I think there is no conflict; I think the Senator from Montana is mistaken.

Mr. JOHNSON. That arose from some misapprehension which I thought could be easily cleared up by a word on the subject.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Montana is mistaken. I have furnished the Senator the list, which is unquestionably the list of battleships that the British have retained.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, the Senator from Maine has convinced the Senator from Montana that the Senator from Montana was wrong? Very well.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He has not done so as yet.

Mr. HALE. I have given the present standard tonnage of the British battleships and battle cruisers as estimated by the British.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest that the Senator from Montana put his list in the RECORD, and that the Senator from Maine put his list in the RECORD, and we can then decide between them.

Mr. HALE. The only difference is that the Senator from Montana was talking about the list we had at the time of the treaty, under design tonnage, and I am referring to the list under standard tonnage.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, some time ago I suggested that out of our generosity at the Washington Disarmament Conference we had yielded a superiority of 10 per cent. I am very conservative in my figures. I took the lesser figures which had been given to me. We yielded a superiority of at least 10 per cent even in the tonnage of capital ships; we yielded to Britain's desire for bases all over the world, and particularly in the Pacific; we yielded the only possible base that we had in the Pacific; we yielded to Britain, in addition to that, the superiority in cruisers, and we did it all with a fine, splendid, hysterical credulity that made us imagine that in the days following we were going to have parity with Great Britain in the construction of our Navy.

Sir, I have just read recent fairly official utterances upon the question of parity wherein the gentlemen speaking concede such parity to us. Then I return for a moment to the Geneva conference to demonstrate to you, if it be possible, from the words of Lord Cecil and from the book before me of Commander Kenworthy that the real thing which split the Geneva conference, after all, was parity, and that when that question arose the British delegation were brought home, and the opportunity for an agreement was rendered very, very difficult.

In February, 1928, after we had embarked upon this very modest program of ours, and when it was a matter of discussion in the United States, Mr. Bridgeman, the gentleman of the rosy cheeks and the blue eyes and the smile for disarmament, that is referred to by Commander Kenworthy, said:

> There is no need—

And Mr. Bridgeman is the First Lord of the Admiralty, recall—

> There is no need to get excited, worried, or annoyed about the American naval program of which we hear so much. The United States of America has a perfect right, subject to the Washington convention, to build whatever fleet it thinks is necessary for its own defense. * * *
> It is inconceivable—

He said—> that either America or Britain should intend aggressive warlike ideas in these days.

And I reecho, of course, as does every man upon this floor, that sentiment—

> Let us go quickly on with what we think is necessary for ourselves. Let them go on with what they think is necessary for themselves, and let us hope if they build a larger navy, their navy will be as great a factor in the preservation of the peace of the world as the British Navy has been.

That I quote from the London Times of February 12, 1928.

The First Lord of the Admiralty, then, in 1928, when we embarked upon our program, says, "Let them go on and build as they deem appropriate. Let us rejoice in the building that they do. Let us not get worried or excited"; but Americans who have their eyes cast across the waters most of the time, and who pride themselves upon being termed "internationalists," raise the hue and cry that Bridgeman declines to raise, and they say, "Oh, you must not build, because if you build you are offensive to Great Britain."

They are the ones that raise the cry of offense, not the First Lord of the Admiralty there. He understands that he can take care of himself, and his country will take care of itself. Our internationalists, our hysterical women's organizations, and the like, cry aloud to us here and say, "We must not build at all for fear we offend Britain." They, indeed, are the ones who present the opposition to this particular course that is to be pursued by this bill—they of America—while Britain has no such objection, according to the First Lord of the Admiralty, to that construction.

Again, sir, in a very recent utterance of Lord Lee of Fareham, in November, 1928, as published in the Manchester Guardian of November 20, 1928, I find these words quoted:

Lord Lee said:

> Why, then, all this excitement over naval parity, a principle or a sentiment to which both countries gave their whole-hearted and emphatic approval in 1921, and which neither of us has ever challenged since?

Lord Lee, you know, was one of the plenipotentiaries here with us in 1921–22, one of those who participated in the disarmament conference.

Indeed—

Said he—

> to question its validity in any way would be to dishonor our signatures at Washington, my own amongst them, and to make us bywords amongst the nations.

Again, he says:

> We ask nothing of America; we want no political nor financial favors, nor have we any desire to interfere with her discretion in building as many cruisers as—after duly weighing all the implications of the Kellogg pact—she may consider right and necessary. All that we ask—and I think we have the right to expect this much—is a belief in our good faith and our "reciprocity of good will."

All that Britain has the right to ask is concerning our good faith; and all that any of us who build these cruisers desire to say to Britain is that "We reciprocate your good will." There is no other design. It is for Americans unfortunately to find some other purpose than these who are official in Great Britain find in this program. It is for Americans here in our land—pacifists, ladies' associations, Friday morning clubs, Tuesday noon clubs, Wednesday 9 o'clock in the morning clubs, and Thursday 6 o'clock in the evening clubs—that are passing the resolutions and loading us down with the propaganda—Americans who deny the right of America to build! The Englishmen say, these in authority, "Build as you will. All we ask is good will—reciprocity of good will." We reecho it. "Good will is ours toward you of Great Britain—we who speak your language; good will, reciprocity of good will. But under the skies that are ours, by virtue of the destiny that is the destiny of this Republic, because this country is going forward in the fashion that it has, and needs the preparation that is essential—because, indeed, we are Americans, and thinking first of America—let us build as we see fit and as we desire and as we require for America, and America alone."

That is the only fashion in which I am thinking in this debate, and that is the only way in which I desire to have my vote taken upon this cruiser bill. These gentlemen in authority in Great Britain have stated, as I say to you, their indifference to what we do in the building line; and with the charm that our British brethren ever have possessed they say to us they recognize that we are entitled to parity—this in 1928, when we are embarked upon our building program. They say, "You are entitled to parity, and we have never denied it"; and Lord Lee, who signed the report of the Washington Disarmament Conference, says, "My signature I should consider dishonored and our nation should be a byword with all the nations of the earth if ever I questioned the right of parity of the United States of America with Great Britain."

But in 1927, when Bridgeman, the First Lord of the Admiralty, was over at Geneva with those who represented us, there was another story told; and it is told not by our people. I would scarcely dare in this presence offer the evidence of mere Americans; and so it is, sir, that I turn to our English authorities, so that they can not be questioned. I recognize how readily any authority that emanated from a mere American's lips might be questioned in this country to-day. I recognize the large number of people there are in this Nation who scoff at the very word "patriotism," and who would take from the young that we bring up the love of country that has made America what it is. I recognize that; and so I turn to an English authority as to what transpired at Geneva, so that with our Americans protesting against 15 cruisers there may be no doubt of the authenticity of what is repeated.

I read you a moment ago:

The revolt of the Admiralty and of authoritative opinion in the ruling class against the principle of parity had been carried into the Conservative cabinet. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Churchill, was recognized as a recruit to this revolt when, in a speech at the Mansion House (July 12, 1927), he said, at a critical stage of the conference:

"I should regard it as the paramount duty of the British Exchequer, in priority to all other considerations, to find any money that was really needed to safeguard those sea-borne food supplies without which neither the life nor the independence of the British nation could continue."

He thus cut the ground from under the conference by putting the power of the purse on the side of naval expenditure instead of on that of naval economy. The significance of this did not escape the Americans, who had long suspected that the British did not mean, and never had meant, to accept parity in sea power; but only parity in the more costly mechanical weapons in which they could not compete with the Americans.

Now let us see what Cecil says, who resigned finally, as you recall. The incident is so recent that I do not attempt to detail it. We will let Cecil tell his story as he told it to Parliament:

Before we set out, there was a discussion in the committee of imperial defense as to the case that we were to lay before the conference. In the course of that discussion the question was raised whether we were to admit that the Americans were entitled to equality in cruisers on the same model as that which had been conceded to them in battleships. I certainly understood—I may have been wrong—that influential members of the committee expressed the view that unless we conceded this it was no use going to Geneva.

The Americans attached great importance to what they called "parity"—that is to say, equality of auxiliary craft on the same lines as the equality of battleships agreed upon at Washington. The First Lord of the Admiralty and his advisers at Geneva saw no great objection to accepting the American contention on this point, and after a few days he made it quite clear that though we doubted whether the American need for cruisers was as great as ours, we had no objection to their building up to our limit if they wished to do so. It was, of course, understood that this should be part of the agreement that we were then negotiating. Unfortunately this decision caused great anxiety to some of our colleagues, though we had in fact received express authority from the cabinet to agree to it. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, for instance, has since the breakdown of the conference stated specifically:

"Therefore we are not able now—and I hope at no future time—to embody in a solemn international agreement any words which would bind us to the principle of mathematical parity in naval strength. Though I do not in the least agree with him, I am quite sure that my right honorable friend is convinced that this warning is essential to the safety of this country. I am equally sure that, if persisted in, it bangs, bolts, and bars the door against any hope of a further agreement with the United States on naval armaments."

My right honorable friend is a very forceful personality, and I have no doubt that from the moment that he realized that we had at Geneva agreed to what he calls the principle of mathematical parity—that is to say, that we had extended to cruisers the standard accepted for battleships—he began to press on his colleagues the necessity of avoiding the consequences of what he regarded as a disastrous concession.

Then, reviewing the cruisers and guns, Cecil continued:

I was very much disturbed. Agreement seemed to me to be in sight, and I felt that if there were to be an adjournment for some days it was only too likely that the opportunity would pass. However, the wording of the summons left us no alternative but to obey. When we got home we found, as I have already intimated, that certain members of the cabinet strongly took the view afterwards expressed in public by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They thought that it would be most dangerous to have stated in the treaty that the Americans were entitled to mathematical parity in auxiliary vessels. These ministers clearly intimated that they preferred no agreement to one embodying that principle.

That was one of the reasons why Cecil resigned from the cabinet, and he gave to the world in the Parliament his reasons for so resigning.

So much for parity. Now they say we may have it. Very well; it is immaterial to me, and it ought to be immaterial to our building program; but when they have agreed in the disarmament conference of 1922, when, indeed, they repeat now in 1928 that they are willing that parity should be ours, when we have constantly and continuously since the first day that any agreement was made in relation to disarmament acted upon that theory, it would be a fraud upon the American people to assert now that we could not build if we desired upon a parity with England and just exactly as Great Britain has seen fit to build.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator from California find any significance in the fact that the British offer of parity is now made just as the first of the 1922 cruisers built for the United States is taking the water?

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from New Hampshire has grasped the very point that I have been endeavoring to elucidate. Of course, the reason that I showed to you that the first intimation of a desire for a disarmament conference came from Great Britain—the reason that I demonstrate that the first real call was made in the Houses of Parliament for a naval limitation—was to indicate why, and who did it, and to show that our Limitation of Armaments Conference held in Washington in 1922 was, after all, because our superiority in battleships was so great that Britain found it necessary that some steps be taken in order to reach a parity with us upon that particular kind of craft.

Then, when we had agreed upon parity in 1922 with Great Britain and fixed a ratio of 5–5–3, immediately Britain begins building, with her cruisers, as the letter of the treaty might have permitted, but as every British statesman now practically concedes was in violation of the spirit of the treaty. Then Britain, proceeding with her building, denies, indeed, as she did at Geneva, the parity that had been a part of the Washington agreement; but in 1928, when we begin again a naval program in the House of Representatives, and state a position concerning that naval program, then Britain says, "Of course, we believe that the United States is entitled to parity, and none of us have ever gainsaid it; and, indeed, it would be a denial of our own signatures and make us a byword among the nations of the world to urge anything to the contrary."

We will go on if we have any vision in this country. We will build just as we ought to build, and as I think we ought to build, not in gestures. I am sick and tired of gestures made in this body, gestures with no substance to them, and with no design upon the part of some of the people who are parties to the gestures ever to see them in fruition at all. We will go on, not with a gesture, striking out the time limit within this bill. We will go on building as we ought to build, as the bill itself in its original form directs the building of these ships, go on until we have a Navy fit to protect and safeguard the commerce of the United States which constitutes, indeed, supremacy upon the sea of all the commerce of the world.

We are asked, in another aspect, to delay for a period in order that there may be another agreement in regard to international law and the freedom of the seas. I have no objection to sticking onto this bill 456 amendments by which we may meet in convention with every nation or all nations, to do anything that anybody upon this floor may wish to have done; but if there be any such amendment annexed to this bill, let us adopt it with our eyes open and knowing just what we do, and let us do it only after we have provided for the immediate construction of the cruisers that are described in this particular measure.

Let us think for a moment of freedom of the seas, of the amendment which has been presented by the distinguished Senator from Idaho, and the amendment to the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Montana. Both of those gentlemen believe in the Kellogg peace pact which has just been signed. Both are earnest, and desire, just as all the rest of us are equally earnest and desire, that anything shall be done in this world that may bring peace to it, a permanent cessation from warfare of any kind. They, in their desire to accomplish the purpose that is theirs, have an amendment for the codification of international law as to neutrals upon the sea, with an addition that is made by the Senator from Montana with particular respect to the inviolability of private property.

What is the position these gentlemen take? These are the protagonists of the Kellogg peace treaty. These are the gentlemen who believe absolutely and unequivocally in the efficacy of that treaty. They have just written war out of the world. They have just declared by a peace treaty for perpetual peace. Never again can grim-visaged war be upon this earth. Now they start immediately doing what? Writing the rules of war, writing the rules of war.

That might be a perfectly appropriate amendment to be offered by one like myself, who believes little in the efficacy of the peace treaty that has been signed; but it strikes me as a paradox and an anomaly that these gentlemen, with their high hopes of peace, believing that the Kellogg treaty brings unto the world a cessation of warfare for all time to come, immediately to suggest that we write the rules of warfare now, and write those rules so that they may be respected by every nation that indulges in warfare in the future.

Either this new treaty that we have signed is of some value or it is of no value. If it is observed and war is renounced, if every question hereafter arising shall be determined by pacific means, then, of course, the freedom of the seas becomes a mere academic question and we need not concern ourselves with it in the slightest degree.

Assuming, sir, that two nations that have signed this marvelous pact never again to engage in war, to settle everything that may arise by peaceful means, do engage in war. One nation is wrong, of course. One nation fights in self-defense, of course. What are you going to do? Are you going to write the rules of war, so that we shall trade with the offending nation? Is that the theory of writing the rules concerning neutrals in time of war? Do you mean to say that after our signing this pact, with the solemnity observed, with every nation on the face of the earth signing it with like solemnity, preserving for the archives of all time every scrap that was used in the signature, taking the pens for the museums of the world, that they may be pointed to in generations to come as the instruments that banished war from all the earth—do you mean to say that we have signed a treaty of this sort, and then, if it be broken, we are going to have aught to do with the wrongdoer? How can you, under the treaty, run a blockade of a warring treaty-breaking nation, and if you can not do it, and the treaty is observed, how can any other nation on the face of the earth have aught to do with the wrongdoer? All the nations on the face of the earth of necessity must be banded together against the wrongdoer. What difference does the freedom of the seas make under those circumstances?

I say nothing of the League of Nations, which was to bring peace to all the world. I say nothing of its provisions, by which war should be prevented forever. We are not parties to it, but the other nations of the earth are. What if one nation, offending under the league and offending against the Kellogg treaty, goes to war? Are there, then, to be rules by which we trade with that offending nation?

Nonsense, sir. We need no rules if the pact be of any use at all; we need no rules in relation to war if the pact be of any use. If one nation will break its faith in relation to the peace pact and go to war, that nation will break its faith in just the same way as to the rules of warfare and the rights of neutrals. It is so obvious that it does not appeal to my reason. Because, however, I deem it in its present form of so little consequence, I have no objection to letting this amendment go on the bill.

If this treaty, upon which the whole fate of the universe now depends, which has been eulogized in panegyrics that have been heard around the world, such as have been applied to no other instrument—if this peace pact be of any value or of any aid or of any effectiveness; if the League of Nations, with its covenants respecting war, is not merely the fraud and the delusion and the snare that some of us believe it to be—if there is any efficacy in either or in both, there is no need of writing rules of war at all, and no need whatsoever for doing anything in relation to the freedom of the seas.

Freedom of the seas has been a question, of course, which, ever since we were a little country with a few million people, has exercised this Nation. Freedom of the seas has always been something which Great Britain has refused to recognize in any aspect or in any degree.

"Freedom of the seas" is a delightful phrase. It is like "peace," it is like "renouncing war," like "outlawry of war!" Is not that splendid? Outlawry of war, all the nations of the earth standing together, going forward in militant array against some nation which is outlawed because it has gone to war. Glorious phrases are these, beautiful language, soft and sweet, that has torn us all from our original patriotic moorings in this country. Glorious it is, outlawing war. We will proceed to take any offending nation under the league and under the Kellogg treaty and make it an outlaw among the nations of the earth. But before we do that, we will enter into rules with it for the conduct of war, and for the sale of goods, for the making of money by us after it gets into war.

What a strange, strange situation we have. "Freedom of the seas!" A beautiful phrase. But when you get into war, with your blows striking; when nations stand with their backs to the wall; when a people's existence is at stake, they do not stop to think of the freedom of the seas. When national life is in the balance and national existence hangs doubtful upon the issue, then there is little question of what freedom of the seas may be. It is the strong who act, just as they have acted every time when there has been war, and every time there has come a clash between the nations of the world.

Freedom of the seas we discuss learnedly upon this floor. We talk of rights of neutrals, and we say what a crime and a sin and a shame it is that any man with goods to sell to a belligerent shall not be permitted to sell them as he sees fit, provided they be not in the category of contraband of war. We speak of it here learnedly, like the dry-as-dust professor who lectures upon archaic things. We speak of it, and we imagine that we are fighting a real battle, talking about freedom of the seas.

Freedom of the seas when you get into war? You saw how it was only 12 years ago. Freedom of the seas! There was not any such thing, and this big Republic of ours was unable, during the early days of the war, to have a semblance of freedom of the seas or any international law regarded at all, and I could not but be sympathetic with Asquith when he said that no nice legal distinctions would he permit to interfere with the safety of the British Empire and its necessity of blockading those who were the enemies of the British Empire. That was his announcement during the war. That has ever been the announcement of every nation that ever got into war, and when we got into the Great War, just as Great Britain had disregarded our rights, we disregarded the rights of every other nation on the face of the earth that came in conflict with ours.

Freedom of the seas is well to talk of in time of peace. Freedom of the seas is a splendid thing upon which to draw a brochure and publish a beautiful little volume. But when nations are in war fighting for their very existence no nation on earth is going to permit that which is necessary for the enemy to get past its blockade, no matter whether it may be carried by one nation or another, and no matter how friendly even the nation may be to the blockading one in fact.

There is just one way to obtain freedom of the seas, just one way to protect the commerce of our nation, just one way to go our way and not the other man's way, and that is for our country to be strong enough to enforce its will rather than permitting the other country to be strong enough to force its will upon us.

Freedom of the seas was recently discussed very learnedly by a member of the British Admiralty. It is very interesting. It is entitled "Freedom of the Seas," by Sir Herbert Russell, and appeared in the Military and Naval Record (British) on November 1, 1928. It reads as follows:

> The recent publication of a further installment of the memoirs of Colonel House has aroused a good deal of discussion upon the subject of the freedom of the seas. It is one of those spacious phrases upon which the politicians—and especially the pacifist politicians—make great play. It appears to be assumed in this country that if we would unreservedly accept the doctrine of freedom of the seas all would be plain sailing in coming to a naval agreement with the United States. It is argued that we have much more to gain than to lose by agreeing to renounce blockade, and on the face of it this sounds perfectly plausible. But pacifist politicians are always prepared to rush in where the students of war fear to tread. They will dispose offhand of a problem to which the strategist devotes years of study in the effort to arrive at a convincing answer. Fortunately for the naval welfare of this country, they shoot their bolts without doing any material damage, and nobody begrudges them their presumptive moral victories.
> Freedom of the high seas exists without question in peace time. International understanding sanctions intervention against outlawry, such as piracy or mutiny, without any discrimination as to flags. The idea that this freedom should not be violated to the disadvantage of neutrals during war is a perfectly reasonable doctrine. But unfortunately it is a doctrine which would leave an enemy at liberty to come and go as he pleased under false colors, for to unreservedly admit freedom of the high seas is to surrender the right to stop and search any vessel other than a self-confessed enemy. It would also leave neutrals free of trade in contraband of war as a perfectly legitimate business. We are told that the United States is very emphatic upon the freedom of the seas. Whether this really represents her naval policy I can not pretend to say; if it represents her political view, then how does she justify stopping, searching, and seizing vessels on the high seas—i. e., outside of territorial limits—in the cause of prohibition? To contend that this is done for a particular purpose is quite beside the point, because the same thing in war time is also done for a particular purpose. The Northern States very soon found that freedom of the seas was playing Old Harry with their chances in their war with the Confederate States, and so they established as close and as tight a blockade as their resources would permit.

To begin with, we want to set a definition to this fine-sounding phrase. What exactly does freedom of the seas mean? Is it the renouncing of all blockade, of the right to capture, and the right of search? If so, we must drop the phrase "command of the seas" from our strategical category. The first object of the stronger naval power in every war is to establish a dominance of these vital sea areas. If the freedom of these vital sea areas is to be assured, then the stronger naval power can only deal with palpably hostile ships. If he sees bona fide neutral traders swarming in and out of the weaker enemy ports, he must not interfere with them; even if he is not satisfied they are bona fide neutrals he has no business to stop them and make sure. This is a fine doctrine for the weaker power, to be sure. As the United States is never likely to figure as the weaker power in a sea war, I can not believe that she is wedded to the freedom of the seas as a naval doctrine. If she is wedded to it at all, it must be simply with an eye to business; to enable her traders to supply the belligerents with anything and everything without let or hindrance.

Freedom of the seas as a war precept simply means the negation of war. It implies an immunity which would render the effective pursuit of hostilities all but impracticable. Assuming that the principle is strictly limited to neutrals, it is self-evident that it would be abused to such a degree as to destroy the economic weapon. Let us assume that the freedom of the seas on these lines had existed during the Great War. There would have been no right to search, capture, or blockade neutrals. We need only have transferred our mercantile vessels under neutral flags—quite an easy thing to do in a perfectly lawful manner—to have rendered the "U-boat" campaign abortive. On the other hand, supplies would have streamed into Germany because our navy would have been powerless to stop them, and the war would have been indefinitely prolonged.

War, whether by land or sea, follows two broad lines, the military and economic. The latter, of course, is largely governed by the former. A siege or a blockade may reduce to submission, for economic reason, a garrison or a fleet which, militarily, is quite capable of continuing resistance; the alternative to submission is a break-out and a battle. The siege ashore is the counterpart to the close blockade at sea. Modern methods of warfare render either extremely difficult, the close blockade in particular. Surely the Great War taught us that a struggle between nations is not going to be conducted according to prearranged rules. Academic conventions based upon equity and chivalry are admirable, and every civilized power cheerfully signs them in the hope that they may be observed. But when it comes to a struggle a toute outrance, necessity knows no law. We deliberately violated not merely the freedom of the sea but the immunity of territorial waters for the purpose of destroying the Dresden at Juan Fernandez. Norway was honestly neutral, but the Germans sank her ships without compunction for no better reason than that they might have been of service to their enemies.

Suppose we were to abrogate the economic weapon by accepting the doctrine of freedom of the seas in war, what would be our position? If the doctrine were faithfully observed by the enemy, we should be unbeatable because we could never be starved. Such a prospect is not going to commend itself to the enemy. No great war can ever be fought to finality on the sea alone, but to renounce the economic weapon would render it practically impossible to confer a decisive character upon the naval struggle. "Killing is not the end in war; it is only a means to the end." The grand clash, resulting in a definite victory to one side, may or may not happen once in the course of a naval war. The immobilizing of an enemy is the only effective alternative to reducing him by battle beyond the power of further resistance. But this, again, is only one of the results of the effective blockade which also denies him supplies by sea.

I suppose the desire to restrict the effective of war, as suggested by the doctrine of freedom of the seas, must be regarded as symptomatic of the desire to abolish war. The latter, to my mind, is very much more logical than the former. To abolish war is an act of finality (impossible in practice but still, in principle, an act of finality). To restrict war is an abortive expedient. There can be no binding qualifications to the attainment of victory in a struggle of life or death, which modern war is likely to be since nations will no longer resort to arms without deep provocation. The stronger side may observe "rules" in the pursuit of his success; the weaker side is not going to observe anything in his effort to escape being beaten. Pacifist politicians, with their academic formulae for keeping Mars to the straight and narrow path, fail in realization of what war means. They try and visualize it as a gentlemanly business, when we can never make it anything but a beastly business, and beastlier to-day than ever, thanks to the infernalness of human ingenuity.

If this country declared her willingness to accept the principle of freedom of the seas in war time, there can be little doubt that all the other naval powers would be prepared to come into line, because they would see that we were surrendering more than any of them. I am not prepared to deny that we might stand to gain more than any of them, but our loss would be relatively greater than our possible advantage. We no longer indulge in the old, immodest heroics about "ruling the waves," but we still recognize that our chief source of naval strength lies in our assumed ability to control our vital sea communications and, inversely, to deny these to the enemy. Why, then, should we surrender this chief source of naval strength by proclaiming that henceforth, in the event of war, we should regard those communications, together with the whole of the Seven Seas, free to those who sought to make big profits out of the war without any of the risks involved by coming into it, and who would be primarily concerned that the war should last as long as possible? For this is what freedom of the seas would mean. Blockade and the right of search restrict this unscrupulous game. The Americans think they can not win prohibition without extending the right of search and virtual blockade well out on the high seas.

I think we could not hope to pursue a naval war with much prospect of success if we are to let neutral contraband runners—in which would be included plenty of disguised enemy ships—have it all their own way.

Admittedly, it is a source of irritation that neutral ships should be stopped and their papers examined in the course of a war which is no concern of theirs. For this very reason the process is restricted to the narrowest possible limits, because it may be taken for granted that no power at war desires to provoke hostile feelings in a neutral country. But when a neutral ship is suspected as having on board contraband of war, and when she enters the zone of enemy waters, she is giving a reasonable cause for interception. Under the doctrine of freedom of the seas our patrols and cruisers in the North Sea and the Channel would have been compelled to watch in impotence the procession of ships flying all the neutral flags under the sun pouring into Germany not only the necessities of life but the munitions of war. To abrogate the right of blockade would be to renounce any right to stop this process. One does not blame the United States for holding that nobody has any right to interrupt her trade with a power simply because that power is at war with somebody else. It is natural enough to look at these questions from the point of view of self-interest. America at war would probably take a very different view of the subject from America trying to do big business with other people at war. This is reasonable, but do not let us confuse it with any idea of international altruism, of high moral principle. The right of blockade and the economic weapon generally has always proved one of the most effective elements in our naval strength. We have always recognized it as the right of other sea powers. In 1861 "blockade running" to the Confederate ports developed into a big industry. When a British ship was captured by a Federal warship our Government metaphorically shrugged its shoulders and said, "Serves you right!" Even neutrality carries certain obligations toward belligerents, as the United States successfully reminded us over the Alabama case. With an unqualified doctrine of freedom of the seas there could have been no Alabama case. And when you begin to import qualifications and reservations the word "freedom" inevitably becomes an anomaly.

But, after all, sir, the answer to the question of freedom of the seas is the law of necessity and the right of self-defense. When a nation is engaged in a war such as Britain was engaged in during the great World War it can not be too dainty and delicate in the handling of nice legal distinctions in relation to the law of the sea. It must fight first for success. So, sir, if we talk and talk and talk about freedom of the seas from now until dooms day, we can enforce it in just one way. If we really believe in it, if we really wish to make the seas free to us under all circumstances, no matter what may be the supremacy of those engaged in the war, there is just one way in which we can do the job, and that is by having a Navy fit to do that job for us in the old American way.

And so, Mr. President, there is no way, either upon the theory of trying to make a rule for warfare after we have just signed a peace pact, or the theory of endeavoring to write a new code for freedom of the seas—there is no theory upon which anyone can vote against this bill if he wants disarmament. There is only one way that experience has taught us we can get it, and that is by having the armament ourselves with which we have the bargaining power too.

Mr. President, in conclusion just a word. Elizabeth of Russia, that beautiful and unhappy Empress, in 1817 wrote:

This abyss of iniquities which we call politics is vainly covered with a tissue of brilliant phrases. It is easy for anyone of the least intelligence, whose heart is in the right place, to see through this tissue and to recognize that, in spite of evangelical treaties, in spite of the reign of justice, it is always the weaker who are sacrificed to the interests of the more powerful.

That was true when Elizabeth of Russia wrote it in 1817. It is no less true to-day, and in the days to come it will be no less true.

Let us go on in our own way, never in any hostility or enmity or bitterness or in hatred of any nation on the earth. Let us go on in our own way, not in the way of any other nation. Let us go on in our own way—we are big enough and rich enough and great enough to do it—not for the purpose of arousing any spirit of ill will in any neighbor that may be ours. Let us go on in our own way to build as we believe we ought to build, and what we seek by the measure before us is a very modest program for our own. Let us pass the bill and, if it be necessary, let us pass another, but let America protect herself, and when America is able to protect herself, again we may have a convention for the limitation of armaments, again we may hold our conferences upon the freedom of the seas, and again, sir, we may meet and sing in ecstacy our pæans of praise, and again, sir, America will be protected and America will be able to take care of herself.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I was prepared to address the Senate this afternoon at some length upon the pending cruiser bill, but the hour has now grown so late that I desire merely to give notice that on to-morrow I shall seek recognition as soon as possible after the convening of the Senate.

TERMS OF COURT IN NEW HAMPSHIRE

Mr. NORRIS. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 5515) to amend section 95 of the Judicial Code, as amended, and I submit a report (No. 1583) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. HALE. It will not lead to debate?

Mr. NORRIS. It will not lead to debate.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the bill?

Mr. MOSES. The bill merely changes the time of holding court in the district of New Hampshire.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert:

That section 95 of the Judicial Code, as amended by an act approved February 28, 1926, is further amended to read as follows: "The State of New Hampshire shall constitute one judicial district, to be known as the district of New Hampshire. Terms of the district court shall be held at Concord on the second Tuesday in January, the last Tuesday in April, and the first Tuesday after the second Monday in November; and at Littleton on the first Tuesday after the third Monday in September."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS' REUNION, CHARLOTTE, N. C.

Mr. SWANSON. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15324) authorizing the attendance of the Marine Band at the Confederate Veterans' reunion to be held at Charlotte, N. C., and I submit a report (No. 1578) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the President is authorized to permit the United States Marine Band to attend and give concerts at the Thirty-ninth Annual Confederate Veterans' Reunion to be held at Charlotte, N. C., June 4 to 7, inclusive, 1929.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of defraying the expenses of the band in attending such reunion there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the payment of such expenses shall be in addition to the pay and allowances to which members of the United States Marine Band would be entitled while serving at their permanent station.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 54: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 54, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 17 of the engrossed amendments strike out lines 5 to 8, inclusive. On page 22 of the said engrossed amendments strike out lines 21 to 23, inclusive. On page 31 of the said engrossed amendments strike out lines 3 to 5, inclusive; and the Senate agree to the same.

ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
PETER NORBECK,
PETER G. GERRY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. T. FITZGERALD,
RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
ARTHUR H. GREENWOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16301) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the bill may be read for amendments, amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

GARNIERS BAYOU BRIDGE, OKALOOSA COUNTY, FLA.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming if he will not permit me to have a bridge bill considered? It is necessary to get the bill over to the House if there is to be any action taken on it at this session. Its consideration will require but a minute.

Mr. WARREN. Unless the bill occasions some delay, I will yield to the Senator for its consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 5129.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5129) authorizing Thomas E. Brooks, of Camp Walton, Fla., and his associates and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the mouth of Garniers Bayou, at a point where State Road No. 10, in the State of Florida, crosses the mouth of said Garniers Bayou, between Smack Point on the west and White Point on the east, in Okaloosa County, Fla., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in order to facilitate intrastate commerce, improve the postal service, and provide for military and other purposes, Thomas E. Brooks, of Camp Walton, Fla., his associates and assigns, be, and are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the mouth of Garniers Bayou, in Okaloosa County, Fla., at a point where State Road No. 10, in the State of Florida, crosses the mouth of said Garniers Bayou, between Smack Point on the west and White Point on the east, in Okaloosa County, Fla., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved

March 23, 1906, and subject to the conditions and limitations contained in this act.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon Thomas E. Brooks, of Camp Walton, Fla., his associates and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is situated, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation or expropriation of property for public purposes in such State.

SEC. 3. The said Thomas E. Brooks, of Camp Walton, Fla., and his associates and assigns, is hereby authorized to fix and charge tolls for transit over such bridge, and the rates of tolls so fixed shall be legal rates until changed by the Secretary of War under the authority contained in the act of March 23, 1906.

SEC. 4. After the completion of such bridge, as determined by the Secretary of War, either the State of Florida, any public agency or political subdivision of said State, within or adjoining which any part of such bridge is located, or any two or more of them jointly, may at any time acquire and take over all right, title, and interest in such bridge and its approaches, and any interest in real property necessary therefor, by purchase or by condemnation or expropriation, in accordance with the laws of the State of Florida governing the acquisition of private property for public purposes by condemnation or expropriation. If at any time after the expiration of 20 years after the completion of such bridge the same is acquired by condemnation or expropriation, the amount of damages or compensation to be allowed shall not include good will, going value, or prospective revenues or profits, but shall be limited to the sum of (1) the actual cost of constructing such bridge and its approaches, less a reasonable deduction for actual depreciation in value; (2) the actual cost of acquiring such interest in real property; (3) actual financing and promotion costs not to exceed 10 per cent of the sum of the cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches and acquiring such interests in real property; (4) actual expenditures for necessary improvements.

SEC. 5. If such bridge shall at any time be taken over or acquired by the State or public agencies or political subdivisions thereof, or by either of them, as provided in section 4 of this act, and if tolls are thereafter charged for the use thereof, the rate of toll shall be so adjusted as to provide a fund sufficient to pay for the reasonable cost of maintaining, repairing, and operating the bridge and its approaches under economical management, and to provide a sinking fund sufficient to amortize the amount paid therefore, including reasonable interest and financing cost, as soon as possible under reasonable charges, but within a period of not exceeding 20 years from the date of acquiring the same. After a sinking fund sufficient for such amortization shall have been so provided, such bridge shall thereafter be maintained and operated free of tolls, or the rate of toll shall thereafter be so adjusted as to provide a fund of not to exceed the amount necessary for the proper maintenance, repair, and operation of the bridge and its approaches under economical management. An accurate record of the amount paid for acquiring the bridge and its approaches, the actual expenditures for maintaining, repairing, and operating the same, and of the daily tolls collected shall be kept and shall be available for the information of all persons interested.

SEC. 6. The said Thomas E. Brooks, and his associates and assigns, shall within 90 days after the completion of such bridge, file with the Secretary of War and with the Highway Department of the State of Florida, a sworn itemized statement showing the actual original cost of constructing the bridge and its approaches, the actual cost of acquiring any interest in real estate necessary therefor, and the actual financing and promotion costs. The Secretary of War may, upon request of the Highway Department of the State of Florida, at any time within three years after the completion of such bridge, investigate such costs and determine the accuracy and reasonableness of the costs alleged in the statement of costs so filed, and shall make a finding of the actual and reasonable costs of constructing, financing, and promoting such bridge; for the purpose of such investigation the said Thomas E. Brooks, his associates and assigns, shall make available all of their records in connection with the construction, financing, and promotion thereof. The finding of the Secretary of War as to the reasonable costs of construction, financing, and promotion of the bridge shall be conclusive for the purposes mentioned in section 4 of this act, subject only to review in the court of equity for fraud or gross mistake.

SEC. 7. The right to sell, assign, transfer, and mortgage all the rights, powers, and privileges conferred by this act is hereby granted to the said Thomas E. Brooks, of Camp Walton, Fla., his associates and assigns; and any corporation or person to which or to whom such rights, powers, and privileges may be sold, assigned, or transferred, or who shall acquire the same by mortgage foreclosure or otherwise, is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise the same as fully as though conferred herein directly upon such corporation or person.

SEC. 8. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROCK RIVER BRIDGE, JANESVILLE, WIS.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14920) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Wisconsin to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Rock River at or near Center Avenue, Janesville, Rock County, Wis.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand that there is some necessity for haste in the case of the bill for which the Senator from Wisconsin asks consideration, and, unless it shall lead to some debate, I shall yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the bill in the regular form of bridge bills?

Mr. BLAINE. It is in the regular form of such bills. It has passed the House of Representatives, and has been favorably reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate. The bridge proposed to be constructed is to be a free, public bridge. It is very essential to have the notice for the letting of the contract published immediately.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, why would it not be a good idea to ask unanimous consent that all of the bridge bills which are in the usual form be passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an appropriation bill before the Senate at this time, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has asked unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill named by him.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not objecting to the consideration of that bill, but I only thought we might clear the calendar of bridge bills.

Mr. WARREN. We want to consider, and, if possible, complete the pending bill to-night, and then to-morrow we may consider the calendar and go through with all the bridge bills.

Mr. SMOOT. I merely suggested that the bridge bills should be passed.

Mr. DALE. There is one bridge bill on the calendar to which there is objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, I should not press the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin for the consideration of the bill named by him?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14920) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Wisconsin to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Rock River, at or near Center Avenue, Janesville, Rock County, Wis.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the Vice President:

S. 4979. An act to authorize the city of Niobrara, Nebr., to transfer Niobrara Island to the State of Nebraska;

H. R. 9570. An act to provide for the transfer of the returns office from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11859. An act for the relief of B. C. Miller; and

H. J. Res. 350. Joint resolution to provide for the reappointment of Frederic A. Delano and Irwin B. Laughlin as members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16301) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this appropriation bill has come up without any notice of any kind. Does not the Senator from Wyoming think there ought to be a quorum present so that Senators may know that the bill is being considered?

Mr. WARREN. Is it the intention of the Senator from Washington to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. DILL. I think it is only fair to Senators who have gone away thinking that the cruiser bill was the only bill which would be considered during the remainder of to-day's session.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Washington has the right to suggest the absence of a quorum, and, of course, I do not care to object, and shall not do so.

Mr. DILL. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The roll will be called.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Keyes	Shortridge

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The first amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, at the beginning of line 9, it is proposed to insert "additional secretary to the President, $10,000."

Mr. WARREN. I offer a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the chairman of the committee explain why it is that provision is made in this bill for an additional secretary to the President? We have had many Presidents who have gotten along with one secretary and his assistants. Why is it necessary to have an additional one for the incoming President?

Mr. WARREN. I assume that the duties of the office will require additional help. As a matter of fact, there are now two secretaries in the Executive Office, although there is only one secretary appropriated for as such. This amendment gives the incoming President an additional secretary in the regular way by an appropriation as a separate item in the bill. The item, of course, came from the Budget Bureau in the regular way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the amendment mean that there will be three secretaries to the new President?

Mr. WARREN. There will be three when this bill shall have become a law, if the amendment shall be agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. At $10,000 each?

Mr. WARREN. There will be three at $10,000 each.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is that two more than the present President has?

Mr. WARREN. It is one more, so far as the record shows; in fact, there will be but one more in the service.

Mr. CARAWAY. As a matter of fact, there will be two more than he now has?

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of fact, there will be one more than he now has in the service.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. Clark is a secretary at the White House, but he does not get $10,000 a year. This amendment really amounts to providing for two more secretaries, giving three at $10,000 each.

Mr. CARAWAY. Was there some reason shown for it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. Hoover wanted it; that is all I know.

Mr. CARAWAY. That might not constitute a reason.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not going to oppose the amendment, though I wish to express my own opposition to it. I can not, however, imagine what circumstances in the world would require the incoming President of the United States to have three secretaries, for the secretarial work of the Executive Office is now conducted, I think, very splendidly with one secretary and the assistants that he has. It looks like legislation merely for the purpose of making a place for somebody. I do not think the Congress ought to do that, and I want to express my disapproval of it.

Mr. WARREN. I am sorry the Senator disapproves; but as I have stated, it is only an increase all together of one secretary for the incoming President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to call attention to the fact that President Harding—and President Wilson, if I remember correctly—had an item put in the appropriation bill for an extra man, although he was not called a secretary.

Mr. OVERMAN. But not an extra $10,000 man.

Mr. McKELLAR. My impression is that the secretary to President Wilson received at first a salary of $6,500, which perhaps was raised to $7,500. Now it is proposed to have three secretaries at $10,000 each. I merely want to express my absolute disapproval of any such action as is proposed. It looks as if we are merely legislating offices for certain people. I think that is a very unwise policy. I believe one secretary and his assistants can do all the work that is necessary to be done in the Executive Office, and I do not think we ought to expend the people's money in any such way as is here proposed.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I do not understand the chairman of the committee. I am told by one Senator that it means two secretaries, and the Senator from Wyoming then says, in effect, it means one additional secretary. What is the correct number?

Mr. WARREN. I have already stated to the Senator from Tennessee, who preceded the Senator from Arkansas, what the amendment means; but he immediately said it meant something else, which I did not say. At the present time the President has one secretary, who is on the rolls at $10,000; he has another who is performing service along practically the same line. I do not know how much the President pays him from his private funds, but I assume that the second secretary probably receives at least $7,500 from the United States, because he would be entitled to that much.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh——

Mr. WARREN. Wait a moment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am waiting.

Mr. WARREN. Now we are asked here for another one, which will make three, whereas the present President has two. The difference is that these three are to be at $10,000 each.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do I understand the Senator to say that the present President has a private secretary that he is paying out of his own funds?

Mr. WARREN. No; I do not say that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Then what did the Senator say?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will just listen——

Mr. CARAWAY. I am listening.

Mr. WARREN. I say that he has two of them. One of them is paid $10,000, and the other probably $7,500, because he is being paid out of the general lump sum appropriated for the employees of the Executive Office. We have no way of knowing—at least, I do not have—what the President may pay him from his private funds, because he is a very efficient and a very fine man.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, he is paying him $7,000 now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, is not this amendment subject to a point of order? I am not going to make a point of order, however.

Mr. WARREN. It is not subject to a point of order, let me say, because, first, it comes here from the Bureau of the Budget. Furthermore, it is approved by the committee; and not only is it approved by the committee but on a list in which 19 men in the committee approved it the amendment has gone in.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not going to make a point of order against the amendment; I stated that at the very beginning; but I think it is subject to a point of order. It is creating the office of another secretary to the President. It is clearly out of order. It is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. It was estimated for.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may have been estimated for, but it is subject to the point of order that it is general legislation. I want to say, however, that I am not going to raise that point of order. It is general legislation. There is no reason established for it. I have asked Senators to give a reason for it—why the present President can get along with one secretary and we have to have three secretaries for the incoming President.

Mr. WARREN. I have told the Senator from Tennessee three of four times over, and I have told another Senator, that the present President has two secretaries, and the Senator insists upon saying that he has but one.

Mr. McKELLAR. The new President can pay a third one in the same way; he can pay a fourth one in the same way that the present President pays the second one.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Tennessee can tell the new President what to do. I do not wish to be too previous here before he is even sworn in.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am expressing my opposition to this amendment. I think it is unwise legislation. I want to vote against it. I want it submitted to the Senate so that I can vote against it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Tennessee is through, I desire to ask a question. I just want to understand the matter. My interest in it arises from newspaper and other reports that have come to my attention. Is this for the purpose of taking care of one particular person that the incoming President has in mind?

Mr. WARREN. I have no knowledge at all of that.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is Mr. Richey to be this second secretary?

Mr. WARREN. I can not tell the Senator.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is he the one who is on the President's private pay roll that the Senator says he may be paying so much from this lump sum?

Mr. SMOOT. No; he is not, Mr. President.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, who is that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Richey is the private secretary of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that it is not my intention to interfere with the wishes of the President elect so far as I may know them. I have not met him for a long time. I have had no recent conversation at all with him. I am proceeding in the regular way, as these things come to us with the approval of the committee to whom they were submitted.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator talked as though he did not think we ought to have the information. I am trying to find out. I am not a member of the Appropriations Committee, and none of those things appear in its report, and I was just trying to ascertain the facts. I am sure the Senator is familiar with the report that has gone around, and I just wanted to ascertain whether this amendment was for the purpose of taking care of this particular person.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator state how much of an increase is carried by this bill in the appropriation for secretarial and clerical services for the President? What is the total increase for clerical and secretarial services?

Mr. WARREN. The new secretaries will be three at $10,000 apiece.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much more are we appropriating?

Mr. WARREN. It simply amounts, all together, to one more secretary.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Ten thousand dollars more than heretofore?

Mr. WARREN. Yes, and $2,500 more, perhaps, for the other secretary.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish we could have that information. One member of the committee says, "No," and another shakes his head. How much more are we appropriating in this bill for the Executive Office than we appropriated last year?

Mr. WARREN. One at $10,000, and a second one at $10,000, who has been receiving $7,500 before. It will cost $10,000 for one and $2,500 for one of the others.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] agree to that?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts wishes to know the total amount appropriated for the Executive Offices in this bill?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Compared with last year's bill, how much more money will the next President be able to spend for clerical assistance for the Executive Offices than the present President?

Mr. FLETCHER. The total amount for the Executive Offices is $468,120.

Mr. WARREN. It would be $12,500 more, all together.

Mr. OVERMAN. The fact is that the new President is going to have three secretaries at $10,000 each. That is the truth.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is either $30,000 or $12,000. Which is it? Does anybody know?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know how much Mr. Clark is paid, and nobody knows. Mr. Clark is now the personal secretary to the President, and I do not know how much he is paid, and nobody else knows how much he is paid. The truth is, however, that Mr. Hoover will have three secretaries at $10,000 each.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, let me see if I understand that. I understand that there is a new secretary provided for at $10,000, and that the salary of one secretary is increased from $7,500 to $10,000, which makes an increase of $12,500. I wish that had been stated half an hour ago.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] agree to that?

Mr. SMOOT. My attention was distracted for a moment. I do not know what the statement was to which the Senator refers.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it seems as though we are getting away from "Coolidge economy" already, and making a pretty rapid step here in the first section of the bill.

I am going to ask that the Chair put the question. I do not want the RECORD to show that this is done by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the committee amendment it is proposed to insert:

Two additional secretaries to the President, $10,000 each.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is another one. Then the committee amendment has been changed?

Mr. WARREN. The committee amendment; yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. And you are going to add two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is proposed in lieu of the committee amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have been talking about the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about the fact that if the amendment is agreed to there is an addition of $20,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Twenty thousand dollars? We have gone up $10,000 already.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the increase over last year.

Mr. FLETCHER. We started with an increase of $10,000. Now it has gone up to $10,000 more, or $20,000 all together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have a roll call. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WARREN. Why does the Senator want to delay us?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$103,520" and insert "$113,520, of which $10,000 shall be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 20, to change the total appropriation for the Executive Office from $458,120 to $468,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Bureau of Efficiency," on page 9, line 8, after the words "in all," to strike out "$223,830" and insert "$227,630," and in line 9, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$217,780" and insert "$221,580," so as to read:

For chief of bureau and other personal services in the District of Columbia; contract stenographic reporting services; contingent expenses, including traveling expenses; supplies, stationery; purchase and exchange of equipment; not to exceed $100 for law books, books of reference, newspapers, and periodicals; and not to exceed $150 for street-car fare; in all $227,630, of which amount not to exceed $221,580 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 9, after line 12, to strike out:

Hereafter the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency shall certify annually to the Bureau of the Budget, for inclusion in the annual Budget, along with his estimates of appropriations for the ensuing year, a statement of the amount of the savings which he estimates have been effected in the various bureaus and offices of the Government, including the District of Columbia, as a result of the surveys and recommendations made by the Bureau of Efficiency during the previous year; and the Budget shall include a statement, following the estimate for the Bureau of Efficiency, of the reductions or adjustments of appropriations effected or proposed to be made in the appropriations for the respective bureaus or offices as a result of such surveys by the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, just a moment: What is this? What is the purpose of striking out of the bill this language about the Bureau of Efficiency?

Mr. WARREN. It strikes out a paragraph put in by the House, changing the mode in which the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency reports. The Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency objected to it, and I communicated with the House committee and found that the House committee themselves did not know about its being obnoxious to the Bureau of Efficiency, and hence they seemed willing to have it stricken out.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that with that language in the bill we are going right back to the old Taft Commission. That is what that means. It was passed by the House; and, as the Senator says, when the attention of the members of the House committee was called to it, they, of course, would not for a minute think of going back to the old Taft Commission.

Mr. DILL. As I read it, this simply proposes that the chief of the bureau shall present an estimate of the appropriations for the ensuing year, and a statement of the amount of the savings which he estimates have been effected in the various bureaus and offices of the Government, including the District of Columbia, as a result of the surveys and recommendations made by the Bureau of Efficiency during the previous year. What has that to do with the Budget?

Mr. SMOOT. It is not the Budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. The Senator says it is going back to the budget of the Taft administration.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the Bureau of Efficiency.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will yield to me, I think I can tell him what is the trouble. The trouble is that the Bureau of Efficiency is one of those useless bureaus that ought not to exist under this Government. It is a fifth wheel on the wagon. It has no part in the Government. We ought not to let it exist a moment longer. It ought to be stricken out entirely. A certain gentleman has just kept it going for a number of years. In my judgment, the chief of this bureau serves no useful purposes as an employee of the Government; and the bureau ought to be abolished, and ought to have been abolished long ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the only use of the Bureau of Efficiency is that it saves the Government tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if that is the case, wherein is it objectionable to have an estimate of the amount that has been saved and will be saved?

Mr. SMOOT. Those reports are already made.

Mr. DILL. The Senator says the purpose of this bureau is to save money, and here is a provision requiring them to make a statement about it; and the Senator says it goes back to the Taft Commission. That does not mean anything to me.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I have the Senator's attention for just a moment?

Mr. DILL. I want to know what is wrong with this provision of law that requires them to make these estimates.

Mr. WARREN. I take it that the Senator is seeking to know what it means. The Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency makes these reports; but in going into one of the departments where he believes there are more clerks than they need, or their salaries are disarranged, and so forth, when he is invited to go there to look it over, as it is his duty to do, he makes the reports immediately, and those reports go back to the same place. Where he has exercised his judgment in reporting, it leads sometimes to a provision against his going into that department. In fact, as it is now, the chairman or his representative does not go into any department except where he is invited to go; and the idea of striking that out in the case of those early reports is in the interest of saving money, and making reports that may be of avail.

Mr. SMOOT. May I read just a short statement here? I think it will clear the Senator's mind.

Mr. DILL. All right.

Mr. SMOOT (reading):

> The requirement that we publicly certify to the savings effected by us would be most unfortunate. Our success has been due largely to our going about our work in the various Government establishments quietly, gaining the cooperation of the administrative officials, and with their support installing the improved methods we have developed. The results of our efforts have been reported to Congress—

And the Senator will find, if he desires to look at it, a statement of what is called for here—> and until this year it has deferred to our wish that the details thereof be not published.

I could stand here and tell the Senator the different departments that have asked the Bureau of Efficiency to come in and reorganize their whole systems. I remember Postmaster General Burleson stated time and time again that the Bureau of Efficiency, after going into the Post Office Department, had recommended methods that saved hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Government of the United States.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the letter which the Senator has been reading is not responsive to the language of this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. We think it is.

Mr. DILL. That letter says they do not want announced ahead of time what they are going to do. This language would require them to report afterwards what they had done. It looks to me as if this is a method on the part of the House of requiring the Bureau of Efficiency to justify their existence. That is what this wording provides, and the Senate committee wants it stricken out. The wording of this provision is very clear. It simply asks for a statement of the amounts saved and how they saved them. That would not require them to tell what they were going to do.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as a member of the committee, I will say that no reason satisfactory to me was ever given why this language should be stricken out. There appeared a statement as to savings inaugurated upon recommendations of the Bureau of Efficiency. It was mere speculation. For instance, we had one item above $60,000 that would be saved provided a particular bureau would accept the suggestions of the Bureau of Efficiency, but we had nobody from the bureau to be affected before us to tell us whether or not that statement was accurate. The probability is that had we brought somebody from that bureau before the committee he would have said they would not save a dollar by those methods. So I say that, for myself, no satisfactory reason was ever given to me why this language should be stricken out.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the letter which the Senator read does not meet this situation at all, because the letter is an argument that this language should be stricken out because it would result in announcing ahead of time what they were going to do. This language does not say that at all. This provides:

> Hereafter the Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency shall certify annually to the Bureau of the Budget, for inclusion in the annual Budget, along with his estimates of appropriations for the ensuing year, a statement of the amount of the savings which he estimates have been effected in the various bureaus and offices of the Government, including the District of Columbia, as a result of the surveys and recommendations made by the Bureau of Efficiency during the previous year; and the Budget shall include a statement, following the estimate for the Bureau of Efficiency, of the reductions or adjustments of appropriations effected or proposed to be made in the appropriations for the respective bureaus or offices as a result of such surveys by the Bureau of Efficiency.

I think this language is extremely in point, in view of the statement of the Senator from Tennessee, namely, that the bureau is not serving any purpose.

Mr. GLASS. I want to say, for myself, that I think the bureau has served a tremendously useful purpose; but that does not mean that I agree with every recommendation the bureau makes. This is one it has made with which I do not agree, and with which I did not agree in the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this letter further reads:

> We have found that our work is considerably hampered by the publication of the savings effected by us, because of the fact that the average Government official feels that a statement indicating a large saving in his office will be interpreted as a criticism of his administration. In fact, it was that very practice of publicly reporting savings followed by the President's Commission on Economy and Efficiency that led to the commission's abolishment; and we are convinced that by the enactment of such a provision as contained in the House bill the doors of many of the establishments wherein we are now accomplishing large savings by our research will be barred against us.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I want to say that, in my judgment, this is just one of the absolutely useless bureaus of this Government which ought to be abolished entirely. The Comptroller General's office really does all that this bureau might do for that matter. I understand that Mr. Brown, the head of this bureau, goes around and tells other people what to do. We have no evidence—and never have had any evidence—that they have ever accomplished any good. I have read their reports, and when you read one of their reports you can not find that they have ever saved anything, except theoretically. There is nothing actual about it.

The fact of the matter is just this: That several years ago this bureau was established and year by year we have just continued to appropriate more and more money to keep it going. They have a lot of employees. They have what they call an organization and they are continually adding to it. What they are doing nobody knows, and when they are asked by Congress to tell what they have been doing they are around lobbying to get the language of the House stricken out. That is the truth about the matter and we all know it. If we are going to vote for it, let us vote for it and keep this useless organization going on. There has been a fight over it ever since it was established because it has not done any good. We ought to abolish it instead of appropriating money for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I just want to give notice now that when the appropriation for this comes up next year, I propose to have witnesses before the committee, and to take evidence, and see what this commission is doing. I am giving notice of that right now.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, if the Senator does that, he will embarrass the commission. If it tells anybody what it does, that will be embarrassing. They have gotten the executive-session idea down there. They have it in the Treasury Department, and now they want to carry it into this Efficiency Bureau, and when it is proposed that the light be turned on them, they do not want anybody to know what they have done.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator about that, but we are going to have some facts before any other appropriation is made for this bureau. If they are not willing to come and make a report to the Congress, as provided by the House language, we will see that they make a report when they come before the committee next year.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, had this been a matter that involved an appropriation of a million dollars, no head of a bureau could have been more insistent or have clung more tenaciously to the heels of the Appropriation Committee than the director of this Efficiency Bureau upon this mere question of giving information as to what it was doing.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that it has not been for this year only. It is constantly doing the same thing, and has been doing it for years, simply because the head of that bureau knows there is no reason for the commission over which he presides.

Mr. GLASS. I do not take that position, but there is no reason on the face of the globe why the Congress of the United States should not know what the commission is doing, and there is no reason why any department of this Government, or any bureau of this Government, should not be given an opportunity to combat statements made by this bureau, if they are inaccurate, as I have reason to think some of theirs are.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the report of this bureau is published, and contains every item that was appropriated for last year, and it will be the same as to the next year. But the information is not given out for publication in newspapers. It is reported to Congress regularly, and in the regular way comes to the committee.

Mr. DILL. What is the objection, then, to having it reported every year?

Mr. WARREN. I do not care to discuss the matter further with the Senator. Some of the States were anxious to elect a new President, and now some of them seem to be rather shy about giving him anything to work with hereafter.

Mr. DILL. That has not anything to do with the secrecy surroundings the activities of this bureau.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 3, to change the total appropriation for the Bureau of Efficiency from $224,330 to $228,130.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Civil Service Commission," on page 10, at the end of line 6, to strike out "$669,550" and insert "$672,610," so as to read:

Salaries: For three commissioners and other personal services in the District of Columbia, $672,610.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 11, to change the total appropriation for the Civil Service Commission from $1,223,802 to $1,226,862.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Tariff Commission," on page 34, line 14, before the word "together," to strike out "$763,000" and insert "$764,000," and in the same line, after the words "together with," to strike out "$37,000" and insert "$36,000," so as to read:

For salaries and expenses of the United States Tariff Commission, including purchase and exchange of labor-saving devices, the purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, gloves and other protective equipment for photostat and other machine operators, payment in advance for subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals, and contract stenographic reporting services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C. 1309, sec. 5), as authorized under Title VII of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916 (U. S. C. 529–531, secs. 91–106), and under sections 315, 316, 317, and 318 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved September 21, 1922 (U. S. C. 575–576, secs. 154–158; 578–580, secs. 174–180, 182–190), $764,000, together with $36,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for this purpose for the fiscal year 1928, of which amount not to exceed $690,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia and not to exceed $2,000 for expenses, except membership fees, of attendance at meetings concerned with subjects under investigation by the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 8, to change the total appropriation for the Tariff Commission from $788,000 to $789,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 47, line 13, to change the total appropriation contained in this act from $541,314,144 to $541,332,004.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Wyoming about the appropriation for the Radio Commission, found on page 17. I want to ask how the amount appropriated there, $119,000, was arrived at. I understand that the appropriation is made on the basis of the idea that the commission will be an appellate body, and unless legislation is passed it will be an appellate body; but what I want to know was how the amount of $119,000 was arrived at.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I take it that the House committee was fully advised as to all the facts, because they had full hearings over there, and it was nothing with which the Senate committee had to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want the information as to every item?

Mr. DILL. I just wanted to know if that amount was based on estimates from the commission itself or whether it was an estimate carried over from an old bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It is an estimate made through the Bureau of the Budget. I suppose they got their information from the Radio Commission. I have here the information as to the number of employees, what they are paid, and the amount of the appropriations. Every single item is covered here.

Mr. DILL. If the legislation pending to continue the original jurisdiction of the commission should pass, they would probably need an additional appropriation; but that would come in a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That would come in a deficiency appropriation bill; yes.

Mr. DILL. I was wondering whether this was the amount that had been requested by the commission.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the amount requested by the commission, and not only that, but by the Bureau of the Budget.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 4, after the word "repair," to insert the words "and alteration," and in line 10 to strike out "$116,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$166,750, which shall be immediately available."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 10, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

Purchase for the Executive Mansion of an oil portrait of President Coolidge, including frame for same, to be expended as the President may direct, $5,000, to be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the clerk be authorized to correct the totals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 39, line 21, to strike out "$350,000" and substitute in lieu thereof "$300,000."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it may be that the committee will accept the amendment. If it should not, I want to state the purpose of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is the same proposition that was up before. It affects the attorneys of the Shipping Board. The Senate passed upon that question before.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator know that during the year the Shipping Board has sold vast numbers of its ships, or, rather, has transferred them? I do not think there has been much of a sale, because they did not receive any compensation, and I regard compensation as necessary to a sale. They have disposed of a very large number of ships, and it is claimed the organization has been greatly lessened. They say they have discharged a great many employees. Yet we are asked to appropriate the same amount we appropriated last year. It ought to be lessened.

Mr. SACKETT. Can the Senator say how many ships we have sold and how many employees were discharged?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not say. I was in General Dalton's office the other day and, as I remember, he showed me at least two pages, and perhaps three, containing the names and numbers of ships that had been sold.

Mr. SACKETT. In the last year?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understood him, in the last year. There were quite a large number of them, as shown on this paper.

Mr. SACKETT. Can the Senator give any idea of the proportion or number that are operated and owned?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I can not. I just remember seeing the list. In addition to that, I was told that they were discharging employees all the time.

Mr. WARREN. There are a great many ships mentioned as being sold, but very few have been sold. The newspapers have told of bids, but the bids have not been accepted.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know a number of ships were sold to the Dollar Line, a very large number of ships, and to a number of other lines. I happened to be in his office and he showed me the list of the ships that had been sold.

Mr. WARREN. As I understand the Senator from Alabama, he wishes to reduce the amount to $50,000?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. While I do not know about it, yet I am willing to accept the amendment if the Senator understands that when we get to conference we have to meet the views of the other body in some fashion, either give or take. I remember that last year the Senator differed quite materially from the conference report when it came back and caused a considerable delay. I hope the Senator, if we accept his amendment and do the best in conference, will be ready to accept the conference report.

Mr. BLACK. When the conferees reported last year, there was a tacit understanding that there would be a complete investigation made before the next appropriation bill came up. I sent to the House for the hearings and found there had been no hearings. I sent to the House for the hearings to learn if possible upon what basis they reached the conclusion that the appropriation should remain the same as before. I do not want to delay the bill this year, and should like to have the suggestion of the Senator, if he accepts the amendment, that a fair and, as far as possible, an exhaustive investigation will be made, because I am absolutely satisfied if such an investigation were made the amount would be reduced.

Mr. WARREN. I am ready to accept the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 23, line 3, strike out "$2,834,464" and insert "$2,887,000."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana. It is with reference to a matter that came before the committee and did not receive a majority vote, although it was of a nature that is entirely all right to be considered here. It was regularly budgeted and asked for; in fact, the chief justice of the commission has been before the committee. It means about a dozen field inspectors and an increase of about $50,000, so I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. That will necessitate another amendment in line 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 23, line 4, strike out "$2,209,464" and insert "$2,250,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 39, line 6, insert the following:

No part of the sums appropriated in this act shall be used to maintain the sea service bureau.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will state my understanding of the proposed amendment. The place where it is indicated to be inserted, on page 39, after the first paragraph, is not the proper place for such an amendment. The amendment refers in no way to that paragraph or to anything on that page. We had no Budget action behind it. No department has asked for it. I think it is subject to a point of order on account of being legislation on an appropriation bill. There is no appropriation in the bill for anything named "sea service." If it were payable at all, it would be from some lump-sum appropriation that is not designated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota wants to abolish the sea service bureau entirely, this is the way to do it. There would be nothing to take its place in any legislation. The Senate has voted upon this question time and time again.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And the Senator voted in favor of the amendment twice.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember of ever having voted for it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. It was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. We may have let it go in by unanimous consent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming said that the sea service bureau is not appropriated for in terms. How are the expenses of it paid if it is not appropriated for?

Mr. SMOOT. It is paid out of a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course the amendment would be in order under those circumstances.

Mr. SMOOT. All I want to say to the Senate is what I have said before, that if the amendment is adopted we will have no sea service and no one to render the services which are now rendered by that bureau. The whole service would be demolished. This is not the way to accomplish the Senator's purpose. Of course, if he wants to abolish the bureau he should introduce a bill and have it go through the regular course of procedure and provide that it shall take effect upon a certain date. That is the only way he can possibly do it without bringing untold hardship and perhaps untold loss to the service.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the service that the bureau performs?

Mr. SMOOT. They select the seamen to furnish our own vessels with men. That is one of the functions they perform. I hope the Senator will not even ask a vote on it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am very thankful to the Senator for his advice. However, I shall address the Senate upon the subject at length. I would like to have it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator ready to let it go to a vote now?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am not sure how many Senators may have the point of view of the Senator from Utah. I hope to convince the Senator from Utah that he is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Utah has given a great deal of attention to the matter. So far as I am personally concerned, I am perfectly willing to do as we did a year ago—let the item go into the bill and let it go to conference. If the House agrees to it, of course, it will stay there.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is the chairman of the committee willing to do that?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Utah, who has just spoken, will probably be one of the conferees, and if it meets with his approval I am willing not to press the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further amendments to be proposed, the bill, as in Committee of the Whole, will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 1, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The President of the United States of America:

Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

His Majesty the King of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes:

ARTICLE I

Any disputes arising between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes, of whatever nature they may be, shall, when ordinary diplomatic proceedings have failed and the High Contracting Parties do not have recourse to adjudication by a competent tribunal, be submitted for investigation and report to a permanent International Commission constituted in the manner prescribed in the next succeeding Article; and the High Contracting Parties agree not to declare war or begin hostilities during such investigation and before the report is submitted.

ARTICLE II

The International Commission shall be composed of five members, to be appointed as follows: One member shall be chosen from each country, by the Government thereof; one member shall be chosen by each Government from some third country; the fifth member shall be chosen by common agreement between the two Governments, it being understood that he shall not be a citizen of either country. The expenses of the Commission shall be paid by the two Governments in equal proportions.

The International Commission shall be appointed within six months after the exchange of ratifications of this treaty; and vacancies shall be filled according to the manner of the original appointment.

ARTICLE III

In case the High Contracting Parties shall have failed to adjust a dispute by diplomatic methods, and they do not have recourse to adjudication by a competent tribunal, they shall at once refer it to the International Commission for investigation and report. The International Commission may, however, spontaneously by unanimous agreement offer its services to that effect, and in such case it shall notify both Governments and request their cooperation in the investigation.

The High Contracting Parties agree to furnish the Permanent International Commission with all the means and facilities required for its investigation and report.

The report of the Commission shall be completed within one year after the date on which it shall declare its investigation to have begun, unless the High Contracting Parties shall limit or extend the time by mutual agreement. The report shall be prepared in triplicate; one copy shall be presented to each Government, and the third retained by the Commission for its files.

The High Contracting Parties reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the report of the Commission shall have been submitted.

ARTICLE IV

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Majesty the King of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in accordance with the constitutional laws of that Kingdom.

The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the treaty shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall thereafter remain in force continuously unless and until terminated by one year's written notice given by either High Contracting Party to the other.

In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty in duplicate in the English and French languages, both texts having equal force, and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done at Washington the twenty-first day of January in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1929.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty of arbitration between the United States and the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats, and Slovenes, signed at Washington January 21, 1929.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 23, 1929.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes.

Determined to prevent so far as in their power lies any interruption in the peaceful relations that have always existed between the two nations;

Desirous of reaffirming their adherence to the policy of submitting to impartial decision all justiciable controversies that may arise between them; and

Eager by their example not only to demonstrate their condemnation of war as an instrument of national policy in their mutual relations, but also to hasten the time when the perfection of international arrangements for the pacific settlement of international disputes shall have eliminated forever the possibility of war among any of the Powers of the world;

Have decided to conclude a treaty of arbitration and for that purpose they have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

Mr. Bojidar Pouritch, Chargé d'Affaires ad interim of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes at Washington;

Who, having communicated to one another their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

All differences relating to international matters in which the High Contracting Parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, which have not been adjusted as a result of reference to an appropriate commission of conciliation, and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other competent tribunal, as shall be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal if necessary, define its powers, state the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference.

The special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States of America by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and on the part of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in accordance with its constitutional laws.

(b) involves the interests of third Parties,

(c) depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe Doctrine,

(d) depends upon or involves the observance of the obligations of the Kingdom of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in accordance with the Covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE III

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof and by His Majesty the King of the Serbs, Croats and Slovenes in accordance with the constitutional laws of that Kingdom.

The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the treaty shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall thereafter remain in force continuously unless and until terminated by one year's written notice given by either High Contracting Party to the other.

ARBITRATION WITH BULGARIA

In executive session this day the following treaty was ratified and, on motion of Mr. BORAH, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to its ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty of arbitration between the United States and Bulgaria, signed at Washington on January 21, 1929.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 23, 1929.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty of arbitration between the United States and Bulgaria, signed at Washington January 21, 1929.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 23, 1929.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the Bulgarians,

Determined to prevent so far as in their power lies any interruption in the peaceful relations now happily existing between the two nations;

Desirous of reaffirming their adherence to the policy of submitting to impartial decision all justiciable controversies that may arise between them; and

Eager by their example not only to demonstrate their condemnation of war as an instrument of national policy in their mutual relations, but also to hasten the time when the perfection of international arrangements for the pacific settlement of international disputes shall have eliminated forever the possibility of war among any of the Powers of the world;

Have decided to conclude a treaty of arbitration and for that purpose they have appointed as their respective Plenipotentiaries

The President of the United States of America:

Mr. Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

His Majesty the King of the Bulgarians:

Mr. Simeon Radeff, His Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the Government of the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

All differences relating to international matters in which the High Contracting Parties are concerned by virtue of a claim of right made by one against the other under treaty or otherwise, which it has not been possible to adjust by diplomacy, which have not been adjusted as a result of reference to an appropriate commission of conciliation, and which are justiciable in their nature by reason of being susceptible of decision by the application of the principles of law or equity, shall be submitted to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague by the Convention of October 18, 1907, or to some other competent tribunal, as shall be decided in each case by special agreement, which special agreement shall provide for the organization of such tribunal, if necessary, define its powers, state the question or questions at issue, and settle the terms of reference.

The special agreement in each case shall be made on the part of the United States of America by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and on the part of Bulgaria in accordance with its constitutional laws.

ARTICLE II

The provisions of this treaty shall not be invoked in respect of any dispute the subject matter of which

(a) is within the domestic jurisdiction of either of the High Contracting Parties,

(b) involves the interests of third Parties.

(c) depends upon or involves the maintenance of the traditional attitude of the United States concerning American questions, commonly described as the Monroe Doctrine.

(d) depends upon or involves the observance of the obligations of Bulgaria in accordance with the Covenant of the League of Nations.

ARTICLE III

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof and by Bulgaria in accordance with its constitutional laws.

The ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible, and the treaty shall take effect on the date of the exchange of the ratifications. It shall thereafter remain in force continuously unless and until terminated by one year's written notice given by either High Contracting Party to the other.

In faith whereof the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty in duplicate and hereunto affixed their seals.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, January 31, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Father of us all, the great world, which has become so endeared to us and which touches us on every side, is Thy world. Its streams of tendency flow around about the throne of omnipotence. Thy faithfulness is unto all generations, and the old earth has never been false to Thee. We have an ally in every star that shines and in every planet that moves. A sense of reproach is with us and we turn our faces earthward, for disturbance and confusion are from man. Pity us in our weakness and forgive us. Oh, kindle the hidden fires on the altars of our souls and let the heavenly virtues grow in the fullness of their bloom. May the wide sweep of duty be compassed by irresistible resolution and triumphantly borne where wisdom, knowledge, and faith are in full possession. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 6864. An act to authorize the Postmaster General to require steamship companies to carry the mail when tendered;

H. R. 13414. An act to amend section 1396 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the appointment of chaplains in the Navy;

H. R. 13507. An act to amend section 3 of Public Act No. 230 (37 Stat. L. 194); and

H. J. Res. 340. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cooperate with the other relief creditor governments in making it possible for Austria to float a loan in order to obtain funds for the furtherance of its reconstruction program and to conclude an agreement for the settlement of the indebtedness of Austria to the United States.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 15386. An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1513. An act granting travel pay and other allowances to certain soldiers of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection who were discharged in the Philippines;

S. 3002. An act for the relief of Mina Bintliff;

S. 4604. An act for the relief of James L. McCulloch; and

S. 4736. An act for the repeal of the provisions in section 2 of the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1925, for the removal of a dam at Grand Rapids, on the Wabash River, Ill. and Ind.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of river and harbor improvements.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of river and harbor improvements. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ENGLAND. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, in my judgment one of the most, if not the most, important bills now pending on the House Calendar is the rivers and harbors improvement bill, which by all means should be enacted into law before the adjournment of this session of Congress. If farm legislation is not taken up and disposed of at the present session, there no doubt will be an extraordinary session shortly after the adjournment of this session for the purpose of enacting farm legislation.

President-elect Hoover pointed out in his campaign for the Presidency three methods of giving aid to the farmers:

First. The passage of a law providing the necessary machinery for the marketing of farm products;

Second. A revision of the tariff; and Third. The improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country.

In the event the rivers and harbors bill is not taken up for consideration at the present session of Congress, it should without question be considered as a part of the farm-relief program at the extra session. The President said in his message:

> River and harbor work ordered by the Congress not yet completed will cost about $243,000,000, besides the hundreds of millions to be spent on the Mississippi flood way.
> Until we can see our way out of this expense, no further river and harbor legislation should be passed, as expenditures to put it into effect would be four or five years away.

The authorized river and harbor work not completed prior to the act of September 22, 1922, was greater than at the present time, yet this fact did not prevent the Congress from passing the act of 1922, and the authorized rivers and harbors improvements not yet completed prior to the act of January 21, 1927, was greater than at the present time, and this fact did not prevent the passage of the 1927 act.

In the light of this legislative river and harbor history I feel that no good reason can be offered against the passage of the present bill, embracing improvements, the estimated cost of which is only $48,435,415.75.

This is one of the most important river and harbor improvement bills ever before the Congress and its passage should not be delayed. Again, the Government's annual expenditures for highways is approximately $100,000,000, and I am sure I would not want to see this expenditure curtailed, but on the other hand increased.

The annual expenditure for river and harbor improvements to afford better transportation facilities is less than half this amount. The river and harbor work is of such vast importance to the commerce of the country and our national prosperity, the completion of same should be had at the earliest possible time.

I desire also to include as a part of my remarks a speech of Mr. Ernest M. Merrill, an expert engineer and president of the Great Kanawha Valley Improvement Association, delivered January 8, 1929, before the transportation committee of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, which is as follows:

OPENING THE DOOR

It is always a pleasure to talk about a subject in which one is deeply and enthusiastically interested, and your secretary has assigned me such a subject to-night in asking me to talk to you along the lines of river transportation. I am going to select as the theme for my talk to you the simple act of "opening the door," and I am not just going to give you a peep at the picture I see unfolded, but I am going to give you, as I see it, a good look.

Opening a door presupposes a great many things. For instance, opening the door permits us to let people in and also permits us to let people out. It presupposes that there is an inside and that there is an outside. Our Great Kanawha River is just such a door. Its standardization will let us out and let the other fellow in, and will give us access to the great system of inland waterways now nearing completion and will open our valley to the inflow of commodities from this great system and the territory served by it.

The Great Kanawha Valley Improvement Association is an organization of all the chambers of commerce, several of the service clubs, the three great coal operators' associations, and practically all of the major industrial companies located in or adjacent to the valley. It holds memberships in and is represented among the officers and directors of the three great river improvement associations, namely, the Ohio River Improvement Association, the Mississippi Valley Association, and the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. In addition to furnishing and assisting in any way it can the improvement of the Great Kanawha River and the inland waterways system generally, it tries to live up to the aims of the St. Louis Chamber of Commerce as explained to the Mississippi Valley Association at its last convention in St. Louis. That is, "We aim to please."

This association is the outgrowth of a river committee of the Charleston Chamber of Commerce, appointed by Past President John T. Morgan in 1926. It is, therefore, a child of your organization, and its able and efficient secretary is also your able and efficient secretary. There is 100 per cent cooperation between the two organizations, but the river association performs certain functions which could not be as effectively performed by a chamber of commerce, which is necessarily regarded as a local institution. The association has always enjoyed ample support throughout the valley, although it spends comparatively little money, since the members themselves do the great bulk of the work. In addition to promoting the improvement program and holding representation in the overhead organizations, the association, through its river committee, headed by Mr. George E. Sutherland, represents the navigation interests in all navigation matters, such as bridge permits, channel changes, and river maintenance and operation. This service is always substantial and at times even burdensome. So much for our association.

I want to try first of all to show you through my own eyes what a tremendous thing it is we are opening our doors to when we shall have completed our standard facility on this great Kanawha River. There are two major aspects to this great proposition, namely, the overseas or world aspect and the domestic or home aspect.

I have here a map showing Decatur's projection of the world, with the New York meridian laid down as the center line. You will note the location of New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, Seattle, and Charleston first, and the relation of the Mississippi River, extending from the Canadian borders to the Gulf, and from thence to world markets via its port of entry, New Orleans. You will also note that Valparaiso, Iqueque, and the west coast of South America are all practically due south of New York, while the east coast is practically equidistant from New York and Liverpool, there being a difference of less than a day's sailing time between the American and English ports to Buenos Aires or Montevideo. Again you will note the relation of the Panama Canal and the English canal at Suez. These two canals control the competitive trade routes from Europe and America to the Orient.

Coal, its quality and its cost at the canal, is the controlling factor in the mind of the vessel owner in choosing between these routes. To give our Panama Canal the superlative coals of the great Kanawha Valley at a minimum cost is, therefore, to perform a great national service. Why did Mr. Hoover go to South America? The answer is simple. According to the yearbook of the Department of Commerce for 1926, we find that Latin America is our third largest customer among the world groups, but even more significant than that, we find that while our volume of trade with Argentina, Brazil, Chile, and Peru increased 140 per cent between 1913 and 1926, our trade with France, Germany, Italy, and the United Kingdom only increased 66 per cent. Who wouldn't nurse a customer like that?

To reach this customer via cheap water transportation not only insures to him a lower freight rate and better service but insures to us ever-increasing markets for our national surpluses. Further study of this map will reveal to you just how vital it is and of what tremendous world import that the Mississippi Valley with her mines, mills, factories, and vast agricultural productivity should reach tidewater at New Orleans at a minimum of transportation cost. I will not take your time to develop this world aspect further, but will ask you to turn your attention to this map of the United States.

I want to call your attention first to the relative location of Boston, New York, Charleston, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Duluth, Kansas City, Omaha, Tulsa, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Seattle.

I have shown in red the broad boundaries of the Mississippi Valley confined on the west by the snow-capped Rockies, on the east by the beautiful low-lying Alleghenies, on the north by the Great Lakes, and on the south by the Gulf of Mexico. God's own garden made and dedicated to the greatest people on earth. Her mountain slopes yield in abundant measure all of the metals known or useful to man. Her valleys and prairies yield every vegetable, fruit, or grain known or useful to man. Her climate is best adapted to man at his best and to his needs. Her people are the sturdy stock of the hardy pioneers of yesterday. She is governed by the greatest system of government the world has ever known. She is capable of maintaining in comfort and luxury a population of 350,000,000 people.

I have shown in blue the great system of inland waterways it is proposed to construct for the comfort and convenience and economic health of this great inland empire. Here is the Mississippi extending from the Twin Cities to New Orleans. Here is the Missouri extending from St. Louis to the Saw Tooth Mountains and flowing six times as many foot-seconds of water 2,500 miles above St. Louis as flows in the Ohio at Pittsburgh. Here is the Illinois River carrying the 9-foot stage into the Great Lakes, and here is the proposed St. Lawrence outlet via the Great Lakes to the Atlantic. The southland has caught the vision and here is the intercoastal canal, a sheltered inland route for river equipment without transfer into ocean-going vessels, from New Orleans to Galveston and Corpus Christi, Tex., and ultimately to the Rio Grande. Or, turning east from New Orleans to Pensacola, Fla., or at Mobile, turning up the Warrior River to Birminghamport, Ala. And last, but not least, our own Ohio with its great tributaries, the Monongahela, the Allegheny, the Muskingum, Great Kanawha, Tennessee, and Cumberland. This system includes 70 projects aggregating 13,394.42 miles already approved and under construction at a cost of $548,399,717, of which all but $96,129,500, the cost of two first-class battleships, is already spent, and it is estimated that the balance will be completed in terms ranging from one to three years. The Ohio will be finished early next spring and ready for traffic. Our own little 95 miles at a cost of perhaps $6,000,000 doesn't look very big beside these figures.

Up here are north and south and east and west lines drawn through Kansas City. In the territory lying north and west of these lines is the great agricultural empire of the Northwest. Take away the agricultural products of this area and annual farm surpluses would disappear and we would be compelled to purchase overseas sufficient food to sustain us. It is from this area that the great wail for farm relief originates.

Isolated and many times more distant from the coast and domestic markets, cheap transportation is the only answer for this great domain. Population is dwindling, farms are being abandoned, distress and discontent are dominant. Cheap river transportation down the Mississippi for export, across the Great Lakes to our own clamoring markets, up the Ohio to the Great Kanawha Valley and the Allegheny and Monongahela; that is the answer, and the leaders of these communities are demanding and urging it.

Up here are the great iron ranges and copper mines of the Lake Superior region. Great areas of this ore can be loaded into river equipment at the head of navigation on the Mississippi as cheaply as it can be loaded on lake equipment at the Lake Superior ports. It can then be floated down the river at a minimum of transportation cost.

Over here we have the great Appalachian coal fields with our own Great Kanawha Valley in the very midst of it and possessing the only coals anywhere in the country peculiarly and exactly adapted to a diversified metallurgical industry.

Our coals and these ores must be brought together to produce iron and steel, the basic products of the age. Our coal can and will be floated down the Ohio to meet these ores and a great new steel center will result, based on a minimum transportation cost of the raw materials plus minimum transportation cost to the ultimate consumer, not only because of a cheap river transportation, but because of its location at the center of population of the entire Nation.

Coal barges from the Kanawha Valley returning filled with the agricultural products of the Missouri. Agricultural barges from the Missouri returning to the Northwest filled with coal from the Great Kanawha. Ore barges from the Mesabi ranges returning to the Twin Cities filled with coal from the Great Kanawha. Coal to the Dakotas, coal via the Illinois to the Great Lakes, coal to St. Louis, coal to New Orleans, Texas, and the Panama. Vast new markets, vast new industries based on cheap coal and cheap raw materials and cheap river transportation. I could continue along this line indefinitely, but again time will not permit.

What assurance then have we that this project will fulfill the vision of its promoters and really perform the service of bulk transportation cheaper and better than the railroads?

First of all, during the past 25 years our transportation via the rails has increased from 114,000,000,000 ton-miles to 444,000,000,000 ton-miles. That is substantially 400 per cent. Saturation point was reached and passed during the World War, and our railroads broke down. Is it safe to assume that the rails can continue to expand sufficiently to care for the ever-increasing needs during the next 25 years? Again, cost of rail transportation has increased almost as rapidly as volume has increased. Twenty-five years ago our coal cost was 65 cents a ton into Cincinnati. To-day it costs us $1.79, or an advance of substantially 300 per cent. It is rail rates and not mine costs which have let the substitutes for coal win away the markets from our valley. A new, cheap system of transport for bulk commodities is the crying need of industry to-day.

Again, Europe has tried out river transportation. Our ever-functioning Department of Commerce has thoroughly investigated the European waterways, and here are one or two of the vital items which they give us: "The network of railways in Belgium is the densest in the world, being 35 miles of railway per 100 square miles, and 14 miles of navigable waterways per 100 square miles." The Mississippi system of waterways when complete will equal about three-tenths of a mile for 100 square miles, or one forty-second as much as Belgium. Mr. Norman F. Titus, of the Commerce Department, says: "A reason for the Belgium waterway development is found in the following: As a typical freight movement on a shipment of 100 kilometers (220 pounds) from Rotterdam to Groninger, a distance of 225 kilometers (140 miles)—

"Express rail, $2.50, delivered in one day.

"Ordinary rail, $1.20, delivered in five or six days.

"Water, $0.30, delivered in three days."

Mr. Titus further reports that "the Department of Commerce files disclose in 1927, on an average movement of 225 miles on the Rhine, the lowest monthly charge on coal was in May, 15 cents a ton, and in December, 29 cents a ton. Obviously similar cheap transportation in the United States would have a tremendous effect upon our industrial and agricultural development."

The distance from Charleston to Cincinnati via the river is 225 miles, and via the rails 211 miles.

Mr. Herbert Hoover, writing in the November, 1928, issue of National Inland Waterways, says, in part:

"True conservation is to get our water at work. There are imperative reasons for it. Before expiration of the years required in major construction, we shall need more food supplies than our present lands will afford. To-day there are many distortions in the agriculture industry due to the unnecessary increases in freight rates from the war, which can be greatly cured by the conversion of our inland waterways into real connected transportation systems. It is demonstrated by actual rates current to-day that we can carry 1,000 bushels of wheat 1,000 miles upon lake and ocean steamers for $20 to $30, on modern river barges for $60 to $70 as against $150 to $200 by rail. There will be urgent demand for more and more hydroelectric power as the sure base of our great interconnected power systems. Our population will increase by 40,000,000 in the next quarter of a century. If we are to preserve the standards of living and increase the comfort of the average family, we must place in use every resource we have; our race with the Malthusean theory can be won by such development."

Speaking at the St. Louis convention of the Mississippi Valley Association in St. Louis last year—1928—Maj. Gen. T. Q. Ashburn, in charge of the Federal Barge Line, the Government-owned and operated barge-line facility operating between the Twin Cities and New Orleans, gave the following résumé of actual and comparative costs in the Federal Barge Line for the first 10 months of 1928. These figures were afterwards referred to and approved by Secretary of War Dwight F. Davis. They stand out because they are actual operating, rather than estimated possible results.

General Ashburn stated that the auditors of the barge line had made a study of the actual cost of transport via lake vessels for the current season and found it to average, on bulk commodities, slightly less than 1 mill per ton-mile as against rail costs on similar movements ranging from 9 mills to 12 mills per ton-mile while the barge line costs on total Mississippi River movement for the first 10 months of 1928 had been three and ninety-two one-hundredths mills per ton-mile. The general stated that as a better balance between up river and down river movement is developed he expects to cut this cost substantially.

Lake vessel tonnage costs from $65 to $80 per cargo ton, railway equipment costs about $200 per ton, and modern, standard steel river equipment costs from $25 to $30 per cargo ton.

I could multiply this data indefinitely, but I think this should be enough to convince you that there is a large fundamental economy in cost as between river and rail transport in favor of the rivers.

I think, before leaving the subject, I should call your attention to a further broad difference between the rails and the river, which is this: Were the Pennsylvania Railway to decide to enter the valley with a branch line of its great system, that would only be one new transportation system, whereas, because the rivers are just highways open to all, the standardization of our river will be the equivalent to the opening up of an indefinite number of transportation systems and the benefits will be proportionately greater.

I would like to take time to tell you of the great political organization which has been built up around this movement, or show you some of the rapidly increasing tonnage figures which are developing even though the system is still incomplete and disjointed, or tell you of actual results obtained by such shippers as Jones & Laughlin or Carnegie Steel Co., but time will not permit. I will content myself with two illustrations only.

The Carnegie Steel Co. operates the Clairton by-product plant at Clairton, on the Monongahela River. Mr. Orchard, the traffic manager of the steel company, told us on the river inspection trip up the Monongahela by the Ohio Valley Association last October that this plant consumes over 30,000 tons of coal a day, all of which comes in by river at a cost of 14 cents per ton, as against a rail rate of $1.18, or a saving of $1.04 per ton on 30,000 tons of coal per day.

The other instance is the steel tows going down the river from Pittsburgh to Memphis, which save the steel companies an average of $100,000 per tow. Jones & Laughlin just started their thirty-eighth tow down the river last week. These tows range from 12,000 to 14,000 tons of finished steel products per tow.

And so opening the Great Kanawha doorway will bring us out and into this magnificent system of inland waterways from which we are now separated by less than 100 miles of shallow water.

Now, let us spend just a moment on the other aspect of the proposition; that is, what we ourselves have to give and to attract industry to us. I could spend longer on this phase than I have the other, but time does not permit.

Our association has taken the position, and successfully sustained it, that of all the territory located alongside or adjacent to the inland waterways system we have more actual and potential tonnage per linear mile to give to the rivers than any other similar area. Major General Jadwin, Chief of the United States Engineers, expressed it as being his opinion, in his report to the Congress of the United States, that the Great Kanawha River would eventually develop as great a river tonnage as the Monongahela, and, gentlemen, the Monongahela actually handled over 25,000,000 tons in 1927, as against the Suez Canal 24,000,000 and the Panama Canal 26,000,000.

With 18,000,000,000 tons of superlative metallurgical coal in the hill, actual production of over 3,000,000 barrels of high-grade petroleum, 6,000,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas per annum, unlimited quantities of salt brine, kaolin, glass sand, virgin timber, and vast undeveloped water power, God has given to us such a valley as exists nowhere else on earth. With our coal, oil, gas, timber, and glass industries already developed and the ever-widening fame of our expanding chemical industry promising immediate and further expansions, General Jadwin has ample grounds for his high opinion of the prospects for future tonnage in our river.

I hope Mr. Puffer will some time tell you of our relation to the great program of national defense and the conclusions reached by two great boards of Federal investigators, one group of whom selected Nitro for the smokeless-powder plant and the other South Charleston for the naval ordnance plant. This valley bids fair to become the national base of military supplies when the next great war comes to us, as it inevitably will.

I desire to also include as a part of my remarks, a resolution passed by the West Virginia Legislature on January 28, 1929, urging rapid completion of the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, which reads as follows:

Engrossed senate joint resolution 10 (by Mr. Hallanan) concerning appropriations for the improvement of the Ohio and Kanawha Rivers

Whereas there is now pending before the National Congress the so-called rivers and harbors act providing for appropriations for important improvements of the Ohio and Great Kanawha Rivers; and

Whereas the appropriation for the Ohio River will bring to completion the lock and dam system, long sought by the western border of this State, and to the tributaries thereto; and

Whereas the proposed improvement to the Great Kanawha River will afford great relief to the coal industry of southern West Virginia, and will contribute another means of transportation to the great chemical plants located in the Kanawha Valley, and will enhance the opportunities for national defense where chemical plants, easily converted in time of war to munition factories, may safely operate on a protected inland stream and still be accessible to the Atlantic seaboard: Therefore, be it.

Resolved by the Senate of West Virginia (the House of Delegates concurring therein), That the Legislature of West Virginia, concurring with proponents of the said act pending before the National Congress, earnestly urges that no time should be lost in the enactment of this measure in order that important work contemplated may be inaugurated at once;

Resolved further, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the West Virginia delegation in the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate and that they be urged to use their influence to bring forth an early enactment of said measure.

I, M. S. Hodges, clerk of the Senate of West Virginia, do certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted unanimously by the Legislature of West Virginia on January 28, 1929.

M. S. HODGES,
Clerk of the Senate.

SUITS AGAINST DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report upon the bill S. 3581, authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to settle claims and suits against the District of Columbia, for printing under the rules.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The doors were closed.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present House Resolution 303, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 303

Resolved, That the bill (H. R. 15848), an act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, be taken from the Speaker's table, the Senate amendments be disagreed to, a conference be requested with the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and the managers on the part of the House at said conference be appointed without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. Will it be in order to move to recommit this resolution to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report back instanter with an amendment providing that this deficiency appropriation bill be taken from the Speaker's table, considered by the House in Committee of the Whole House, under the general rules of the House which will give opportunity to consider each of the Senate amendments separate? Before the Speaker answers that inquiry, may I have his indulgence for a few minutes to present some views respecting it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be very glad to hear from the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am aware that in years gone by a number of Speakers have held that a motion to recommit a rule providing for an order of business to the Committee on Rules is not in order. I am also aware that my father—and I may be pardoned I am sure in this House for saying that to me he was the greatest Speaker who ever presided over this House [applause]—held that the motion to recommit was not in order. That decision was followed by Mr. Speaker Henderson, Mr. Speaker Cannon, and Mr. Speaker Clark. Mr. Speaker Reed decided otherwise, that a motion to recommit was in order. If the rules of the House were as they were when Mr. Speaker Crisp decided this question, and his decision was the pioneer one upon the subject, I would cheerfully acquiesce, because in construing that decision the Speaker must consider the rules of the House as they existed at that time. The Speaker must consider the conditions as to the procedure in the House which existed at that time.

At that time filibusters were common in the House, dilatory motions were made, merely to delay the House in deciding a question, and the decision of Mr. Speaker Crisp was based solely upon the ground that the motion to recommit was dilatory, his decision being that after the House had voted the previous question on a bill or resolution the House had a right to vote upon it at once, without being delayed, and he stated in that decision that, before the previous question was ordered, it would be undoubtedly in order to move an amendment to the rule so as to change the order of consideration of a bill, but that, after the previous question was ordered, there should be no dilatory motion or delay.

Mr. Speaker, the rules of the House to-day are different. In recent years the rules of the House have been liberalized for the purpose of giving the House a chance to consider matters for itself; to give individual Members greater power. Rule XIII, dealing with a report from the Committee on Rules, has a provision in it now, a mandatory provision, that the Committee on Rules shall not report any rule to the House which denies or takes away the right to make one motion to recommit, and the rule further provides that that motion can be made either before or after the previous question has been ordered. The rule is mandatory. The hands of the Committee on Rules are tied. They can not bring in a rule denying that right. That rule did not exist at the time of the decision of Mr. Speaker Crisp, and to-day it is common practice of this House, after the previous question is ordered on a bill of the greatest importance, say a tariff bill, and it is in order to move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, which action delays the House voting immediately upon it—it is in order to move to recommit an appropriation bill to the Committee on Appropriations, which action delays the immediate consideration of it. The object of that rule is to give the minority the right to express its views on a legislative proposition.

But some may say that this is not a legislative proposition, that it is a rule providing for an order of business, a rule providing for the manner in which legislation shall be considered. The Committee on Rules is the committee that brings in the rule giving the House an opportunity to consider a bill. The minority, in my honest judgment, is entitled to go on record showing the manner and method in which it desires to consider that legislation, because it is very material to the minority to have a right to express its views on certain questions.

Therefore it seems to me that the intent of the rule, that the welfare of the House itself will be best conserved by holding that the motion to recommit a rule providing for an order of business is in order. And, Mr. Speaker, upon what meat does this our Cæsar feed—the Rules Committee—that it is excepted from all the other committees of the House? Why does it occupy a greater privilege than any other committee of the House. If you can move to recommit a bill dealing with legislation to a committee for that committee to change its legislation and bring in legislation in conformity with the will of a majority of the House, clearly logically it is just as much in order to recommit a rule providing for an order of business to the Rules Committee with instructions to bring in a rule providing for a different order of procedure.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I be heard for a moment? I am very glad our friend from Georgia referred to a decision of his distinguished father. I agree that he was a great Speaker of the House and certainly agree with the basis of the decision he rendered at that time on a proposition similar to the one before us to-day. While the gentleman from Georgia quoted a part of that decision, in my judgment from reading that decision fully there is still another inference to be obtained. The gentleman from Geogria, the former Mr. Speaker Crisp, went further in making the decision than his distinguished son infers. He said the purpose of a special rule was to bring the House to a direct vote on the main proposition, and you were not taking away any privileges of the House, because if a majority of the House was not in favor of the rule they had the right and opportunity to vote down the previous question, so none of the rights of the House were denied to the House by refusing the motion to recommit. That is my position here to-day. If the majority of the House is not in favor of what the Rules Committee proposes, it will vote down the motion for the previous question, and then my friend from Georgia will get the opportunity to amend or instruct as he desires. This exact question has been before the House a great many times.

All the decisions I am able to find run in exactly the same direction and agree and are against the position taken by the gentleman from Georgia. It was followed by Mr. Speaker Cannon, by Mr. Speaker Henderson, and especially by Mr. Speaker Clark; and this decision was after the change in the rules that my friend from Georgia spoke of a moment ago. Yet in my judgment this change has no effect on the proposition before it. At that time of the decision of Mr. Speaker Clark we had practically the same proposition before the House we have to-day, only the tables were turned, as far as politics are concerned. Mr. GILLETT, a Member on the Republican side, offered a motion to recommit a resolution from the Committee on Rules. Mr. Speaker Clark was in the chair. Mr. Fitzgerald, of New York, made a point of order against the motion to recommit. Speaker Clark made a decision sustaining the point of order and cited an opinion of former Speaker Cannon on a similar question. And every decision of recent years has been in support of the contention I am now making, that it is not in order to move to recommit a resolution from the Committee on Rules. And I specially call the Speaker's attention to the fact that this last decision came after the change in the rules, upon which the gentleman from Georgia was laying such stress in this argument here to-day.

And I am further very sure that with this long list of precedents before him, the present distinguished Speaker will have no trouble in advising the gentleman from Georgia that a motion to recommit this resolution is not in order.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, may I make an observation?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] referred to the present rule, which forbids the Committee on Rules from bringing in a rule which will operate to prevent the motion to recommit. I beg to call the attention of the Chair to the exact language of the rule:

> Nor shall it [the Committee on Rules] report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent a motion to recommit being made as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

There is a limitation there—as provided in paragraph 4 of Rule XVI.

Now, what does paragraph 4 of Rule XVI provide? It provides as follows:

> After the previous question shall have been ordered on the passage of a bill or joint resolution one motion to recommit shall be in order, and the Speaker shall give preference in recognition for such purpose to a Member who is opposed to the bill or joint resolution.

This is merely a House resolution, not a bill nor a joint resolution; and I contend, if the Speaker please, that the rule does not cover the situation and that the status of the rule is exactly the same now, so far as this question is concerned, as it was at the time the former distinguished Speaker, Mr. Crisp, rendered his decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to answer the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], to whom he listened, as he always does, with great respect for his logic and his knowledge of the rules of the House. The Chair, however, is not aware of any decision at any time which controverts the decision originally rendered by Mr. Speaker Crisp and by a number of his illustrious successors.

The gentleman from Georgia has said, and with much persuasiveness, that the situation is not exactly what it was when those decisions were rendered, so far as the present rules of the House go, covering motions to recommit. However, the Chair does not think those changes in the rules, either in their letter or their spirit, have so changed the present rules of the House as to justify him in overruling all those decisions.

Clause 4 of Rule XVI of the House with regard to the full liberty of the motion to recommit is as follows:

> After the previous question shall have been ordered on the passage of a bill or joint resolution one motion to recommit shall be in order, and the Speaker shall give preference in recognition for such purpose to a Member who is opposed to the bill or joint resolution.

The Chair is prepared to concede that in so far as bills or joint resolutions are concerned the question of the motion to recommit is slightly different from what it was at the time those decisions were rendered, particularly the decision of the honored father of the gentleman from Georgia. But the present rules of the House make no change in regard to a House resolution. This is not a joint resolution. It is a House resolution. The Chair thinks it is precisely in the same status as at the time those decisions were rendered. Therefore in response to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia the Chair thinks that a motion to recommit this resolution is not in order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a unanimous-consent request in regard to the time to be consumed in the discussion of the rule. I have had numerous requests for time on this side, and I would like to extend the usual hour. I ask unanimous consent that the time may be extended to three hours, with the understanding that I will yield one-half of that time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] to yield for debate, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. POU. I suggest that the gentleman leave out the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended to three hours, with the understanding that he will yield one-half of that time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and he further adds that at the conclusion of the general debate the previous question shall be ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. To that last request I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. SNELL. Then I withdraw the last portion of my request, Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that I will yield one-half the time to the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time be extended to three hours, with the understanding that he will yield on-half of that time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is recognized.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the present resolution is presented to the House with the distinct purpose of sending to conference the first deficiency bill. The only way you can get a House bill with the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to conference is either by unanimous consent or by a special rule. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] tried the unanimous-consent route the other day, and he was unable to accomplish that purpose. If this rule is adopted as presented, the bill, together with the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, will be sent to conference.

Now, let us see what the actual facts are that confront us and which have brought us to this situation. In order to do so I think we have got to go back a little and get just a little bit of previous history.

When the bill making appropriations for the Treasury Department was being considered in the Senate an amendment was offered to that bill increasing the amount for the enforcement of prohibition to $250,000,000. That amendment was advocated and sponsored by some of the most bitter opponents of prohibition that have ever been on Capitol Hill, and while that amendment was not agreed to in the committee of conference, nevertheless it sowed some seed that evidently took root when they were considering the present deficiency bill. As a result an amendment was offered to that bill to increase the money available for the enforcement of prohibition by $24,000,000.

Now, what are the actual facts in regard to this? What are the facts which Members who want to legislate intelligently and constructively must meet? That amendment, to a large degree, was and is supported by four distinct groups; and we might as well meet this situation just exactly as it is.

There was one group made up of hysterical drys. It was made up of men who, every time the question of prohibition is mentioned, will jump through a hoop and do anything they are told to do by the active representatives of the prohibition movement. There was another group made up of the bitter wets; men who are willing to do anything in their power to make prohibition enforcement a ridiculous farce, and they think they are helping to do that by supporting this amendment. There was still another group who desired to rehabilitate themselves in the minds of their own constituency on account of the position they took in the last election. In order to be regular many of them supported one of the wettest men who has ever run for the office of President of the United States, and for that reason was very obnoxious to these extreme drys. Therefore in order to rehabilitate themselves and reinstate themselves in the good graces of their dry constituents, and to prove how dry they are notwithstanding their support of a wet candidate for President, they are now supporting the amendment providing for more money to enforce the prohibition proposition than has ever been asked for by any department of the Government and for which there is no provision for spending it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Not at the present time. There is another group of people who are willing to do anything they can under present conditions to embarrass the new administration, and we find that group very anxious to have this amendment adopted at this time. Now, those are the real facts that are before us as far as this amendment is concerned. I want some one to tell me why we should not approach this proposition of appropriating $24,000,000 in the same spirit that we approach any other appropriation of similar size. If we did that, the first thing we would ask is this: Is it needed? Has it been requested, and does the Budget approve, and does it conform with the financial program of the President? No one has ever considered these things; no one claims they have.

No one claims there has been any request from the Treasury Department, or the people who are responsible for this enforcement, for these additional funds. As a matter of fact, I understand it has been definitely stated that it could not be spent efficiently and that a large amount of it would be wasted if they were forced to spend it under the provisions of this deficiency bill. I have never known this House before to insist that a department of the Government take more money than it requested or said they could spend efficiently in carrying out the provisions of the law.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. In just a minute. So I ask the Members of this House to approach this proposition with the same common sense and judgment, that we do others of similar size, and do the same in regard to this appropriation that they would do in regard to any other appropriation that has never been asked or a single argument, except a political one, to justify it. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman referred to the provisions under which the appropriation was made. Will the gentleman kindly detail the provisions for the information of the House?

Mr. SNELL. I really do not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARBER. The provisions under which the proposed appropriation of $24,000,000 is made.

Mr. SNELL. Well, the amendment was put on in the Senate, but I do not understand it was requested by any of the people who are responsible for the carrying out of the enforcement of prohibition.

Mr. GARBER. As I understand it, the amendment was amended to conform to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SNELL. Not at all. There has never been any recommendation from the Secretary of the Treasury, so far as I know, requesting the additional amount that was put on in the Senate under this amendment.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. Is the gentleman advised whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury is in favor of enforcing the prohibition law?

Mr. SNELL. I have never asked the Secretary of the Treasury and he has never advised me, but it is his duty as Secretary of the Treasury to enforce it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman states that it is sought to make the present enforcement a farce. Is it not true that the present condition is a farce and a disgrace?

Mr. SNELL. I would not admit that in its entirety, but I am not entirely satisfied with the enforcement of prohibition at the present time.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. The gentleman stated that nowhere and at no time have additional appropriations been asked for. Is not the gentleman aware of the fact that former Commissioner Haynes, present Commissioner Doran, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Andrews, and every official who has had charge of the enforcement of the law has repeatedly asked for more funds?

Mr. SNELL. No; the gentleman is not informed of that fact and doubts whether that is true, because they are not asking at the present time for any additional funds.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the group which is supporting this amendment is made up of the extreme drys, the fanatical drys, and the extreme wets?

Mr. SNELL. Not all of them. I said a part of them.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Has the gentleman examined the vote in another body on the adoption of the amendment in that body?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Does the gentleman suggest that the amendment was adopted by the vote of the extreme drys and extreme wets?

Mr. SNELL. I said a part of them were; the hysterical drys. I did not say extreme drys, but I said the hysterical ones are in favor of the proposition.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I wish to say to the gentleman that I am in favor of the resolution, but I want to ask the gentleman whether he can state how much it is estimated would be required to enforce prohibition?

Mr. SNELL. I have made no estimate and I could not answer the gentleman.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Does not the gentleman know that Commissioner Doran has stated it would cost $300,000,000?

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. In connection with the $24,000,000 amendment which has been explained by the gentleman from New York, may I ask the gentleman if he is prepared to make any statement with reference to the item of $250,000 for an investigating committee, which amendment was put on in the Senate?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman is not in position to make any statement about that, and the gentleman from New York reserves the balance of his time and yields the floor to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou]. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, there is an old saying that there are more ways to kill a dog than choking him to death with butter, and there is a genuine fear entertained by the membership of this House, a certain portion of it at any rate, that there will be no opportunity for a clear-cut vote on the Harris amendment. For this reason we are opposing the adoption of this rule, and we are hoping that the previous question will be voted down so that the rule may be amended and an opportunity afforded for a direct vote on the so-called Harris amendment.

We might as well look the facts in the face, Mr. Speaker. It seems the time is about here when, if there is ever going to be an effort made, a genuine effort, to enforce the so-called Volstead Act, the time is at hand. [Applause.]

It is a matter of common knowledge that almost throughout the length and breadth of the Nation prohibition enforcement is a roaring farce. As I stand here to-day I believe it would be safe to say that in every ward in the city of Washington, in almost every hotel in the city of Washington, I might say in the Capitol itself, the prohibition law is being violated every day by men who would scorn to violate other laws of the Nation.

I have sat in the courts, Mr. Speaker, and seen the criminal mill at work. It was, in almost every instance, the poor, the humble, the helpless, who were captured by the prohibition officers. I saw a poor, poverty-stricken woman with 10 children sent to prison for selling a pint of liquor. I did not see any of the big fellows brought to trial. It seems they are immune, and it is about time that enough money was being put at the disposal of the departments of the Government to go after everybody that is violating this law, rich and poor alike. [Applause.] This is all it is proposed to do. Officials of the Government do not have to use the money.

Why all this hullabaloo about putting money into their hands for enforcing the law? They are not forced to use it. They can use $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 or refuse to use any of it. It looks as though somebody wants an alibi for failure to enforce the prohibition law.

Whenever the time comes that the administration of this law is put in the hands of men who at heart are for the law, and whenever the time comes that men of that kind are given sufficient means to enforce the law equally against everybody, rich and poor alike, even against the man who filled his cellar with liquor enough to last him a lifetime when the Volstead law was enacted and has been replenishing it since; whenever the time comes that the law is enforced equally against all, then we may feel that an honest effort has been made to enforce the Volstead law; but there are many who do not believe an honest effort has been made to enforce it up to this time. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cooper]. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I have here an editorial taken from one of the leading Democratic newspapers in the State of Ohio. The president of this organization is Justice John H. Clarke, former Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and one of the outstanding men of our country, and I would like to have the Clerk read the editorial.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TWENTY-FOUR MILLION DOLLAR PROHIBITION FUND

If President Coolidge does his duty, he will veto the $24,000,000 increase in the prohibition-enforcement fund. This $24,000,000 is nothing but a gigantic alibi on Congress's part. Such an amount ought never to be appropriated without definite plans as to how it should be expended. Congress has no such plans and means to set aside this huge sum not from a desire to bring about better enforcement but with the sole object of passing the buck and impressing the country with its earnestness about prohibition, when, as a matter of fact, the majority of Congress does not care whether President Coolidge vetoes the appropriation or not. It is cowardly to shift responsibility to his shoulders, and it has no right to embarrass Mr. Hoover, who, if he is as concientious in this as he is in everything else, will have to let the money lie unused for six months or a year until he can find a way to employ it. Meanwhile he will come in for all sorts of criticism, and the country will not know what to believe. That is not the way the people expect Congress to transact their business.

[Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I believe my position on the question of prohibition and its enforcement is known not only to my colleagues in the House but to the people of the country. I have fought for and supported every measure for the adoption of prohibition and its enforcement during my 14 years of service in Congress, and if I thought the adoption of the amendment providing $24,000,000 in addition to the $13,000,000 already appropriated would benefit prohibition enforcement I would gladly support the same.

I regret I must break on this question with my good friend Doctor McBride, the superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League—and he is my friend.

As one who is deeply interested in the enforcement of prohibition I believe it is my duty to work and cooperate with the Anti-Saloon League and other dry organizations in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. On the other hand, however, I have deep convictions on this question, and I shall follow out what my conscience tells is right, and shall support the adoption of the rule to send the report to conference. [Applause.]

I would now like to ask my good friend Doctor McBride why he has changed his mind. Here is what he said a short time ago on this question:

I stated that the larger appropriation can be wisely made under a well-prepared budget by the enforcement department. The Secretary of the Treasury has well said that a survey should be made to see whether larger funds could be used toward more successful enforcement.

This is what Doctor McBride said two or three weeks ago, and now he asks me and the other "dry" Members of this House to support this proposition without these provisions being attached to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I noticed these headlines in my home paper of last night, which came to my desk a short time ago:

COOPER battles "drys"; hits $24,000,000 fund. Mr. McBride stated that "It was hard for him to see how any dry, especially a Republican, should not vote to give a Republican President adequate funds for law enforcement."

In reply, let me say I stand ready to support President Coolidge and President-elect Hoover in any program they have for the enforcement of prohibition. [Applause.]

Doctor McBride also decried the intimation that politics was the chief incentive behind the drive to force the House to accept the increased appropriation.

Now, Doctor McBride is too good a politician for him to try and fool the Members of this House in saying that there is no politics back of the $24,000,000 amendment. I am not unmindful of the fact that less than three months ago the chief supporters of the $24,000,000 appropriation were going from one end of the country to the other advocating the election of a candidate for President who never has been in favor of prohibition, and while he was Governor of the State of New York for eight years he never was interested in enforcing prohibition.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. The voters of our country, and especially those in favor of the eighteenth amendment and its enforcement, expressed their confidence in Herbert Hoover in such a way as would indicate that he would handle the prohibition enforcement question in a manner that would bring results along the line of better enforcement.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not now. I am of the firm opinion that it would be better for Congress to wait until Mr. Hoover becomes President and then get his views as to what he believes to be the best method of carrying out a program for better enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

I wanted to be understood, however, as saying that if Mr. Hoover requests Congress to grant larger appropriations for enforcement I will whole-heartedly support him in his request.

Never in all my experience in Congress have I known this body to appropriate a large sum of money and force it on an executive department of the Government without their asking for it.

I am going to support the rule. I know that possibly I will come in for some criticism by some of my dry friends, but I am as much in earnest in regard to the prohibition question and the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to-day as I have been in the past. But I can not support the $24,000,000 appropriation, because my conscience tells me it is wrong for this Congress to dictate to Mr. Hoover what his policy regarding the enforcement of prohibition must be before he becomes President of our country. I have confidence in the ability of Herbert Hoover to enforce the prohibition laws. He will not break faith with the law-abiding citizens on this question. I believe it would be the wise policy to wait until we get his message on enforcement and then give him our loyal and whole-hearted support. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the merits of the proposals that are contained in the Senate amendments at this time; because, if this House shall avail itself of the opportunity, as I hope it will, to vote down the previous question, and then support a proper amendment to the resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, Chairman of the Rules Committee, there will be ample opportunity for discussion of the merits of these proposals. But I do want to get very clearly in the RECORD just precisely what is before us.

It is not alone the Senate amendment dealing with the prohibition question. Lest we forget, let it be remembered that the Senate has put an amendment on the bill touching tax refunds and future administration of that very important service, that I should judge Members of this House would like to consider.

Of course, it can be pointed out that when this deficiency appropriation bill was originally before the House of Representatives I expressed myself briefly, stating very frankly, that I felt a certain degree of embarrassment in being called upon to vote for an amendment withholding money for tax refunds found to be due taxpayers under the law in existence. But in that same connection I stated that if it were possible to create the machinery to assure a more careful review of tax-refund cases, I would be happy to support it.

The Senate amendment upon this subject provides a method of review and I think should be considered.

So the prohibition amendment is not the only important proposition that is involved, and which will be involved, in the matter of the vote on the previous question.

Now let it be gotten clearly in mind—there is no use for us to deceive ourselves or to try in the future to deceive others, if anyone should be disposed to try—the important vote under the parliamentary situation that exists here, however gentlemen may stand on these amendments, is on the previous question on the proposed special order.

Had it been possible under the rules of the House to have adopted the suggestions offered, or which would have been offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], it could have been reached in a different way. The Speaker has made a ruling, with which I make no quarrel, which leaves the only parliamentary course to be pursued by those who desire to be absolutely certain of an opportunity to consider these important Senate amendments, that of voting down the previous question on the rule and then we will offer such amendments to the rule as will enable an immediate, direct, and certain consideration by the House of these Senate proposals.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I am forced to reflect briefly upon the last presidential election and admonish the Members of the House to keep faith with the American people. Something like 15 per cent of the electoral vote of the last election by some is interpreted as a wet vote, and something like 85 per cent as a dry vote. When the Members of Congress who sit on my left—the Republicans—undertake to throttle the enforcement of prohibition by abiding the dictates of a wet Secretary of the Treasury who aspires to continue to refuse to enforce prohibition, they are refusing to keep faith with the American people.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Not now. I am sorry I have not the time. By the verdict of the people they have called for enforcement. By the unseen powers in the Republican Party, you are saying they shall not have it. The unseen power is your wet Secretary of the Treasury. He is the generalissimo of the wet forces in America and his first lieutenant probably will later prove to be the President elect and his second lieutenant, possibly, is the present President of the United States. My friends, those are the facts. Have you ever heard either of these gentlemen calling for enforcement of the prohibition laws? Where do they stand?

I am glad that the president of the Anti-Saloon League has finally found that he is in the wrong category and has split from the wet Secretary of the Treasury and now demands this $24,000,000 appropriation. I have always supported the president of the Anti-Saloon League and support him now. I am glad he has finally found out the wet-inclined principles of the Mellon-Coolidge-Hoover régime. My friends, the situation is plain, the question of enforcement or refusal thereof is placed on your doorstep. Now, then, will you keep faith with the American people and say in substance to Mr. Mellon, "You have got to make a showing" by honest enforcement against all violators, or will you break faith with the American people and let the bootlegging go wild in the Capital of the United States and other cities, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has just said?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Not now. My time is too limited. I am sorry. Which are you going to do, my friends? Will you keep faith and enforce prohibition or will you let the two or three powers in your Republican Party continue to vacillate and refuse to enforce prohibition? I am going to leave it with you. As for me, I am going to vote for the enforcement of the laws of the land in accord with the dictation of the voters of my district. My church people, my Woman's Christian Temperance Union members, and the rank and file of my district stand for law and order, and I shall forever vote their conscience. They are a dry people. They vote dry and they live dry. They are honest and law-abiding, and I am happy to champion and defend the cause of such people and of humanity. I hope those Republican Members, who happen to be dry Members, will rise above the cracking of the whip of the Secretary of the Treasury and vote for prohibition enforcement.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I am sorry I have not the time. It is on your doorstep. Are you going to keep faith with the moral and spiritual forces of America and say that it will be enforced or are you going to let it pass along and thus protect the nullificationist, anarchic, and communistic forces who would destroy our country? I shall vote against the rule in order that we may have a direct vote on the question and then vote for the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, for the first time since I have been a Member of this body—16 years—it has been necessary to resort to a special rule to send an appropriation bill to conference. This occurs now because the other day gentlemen who are interested in the $24,000,000 prohibition enforcement amendment were not satisfied with the opportunity that they would have had if they had given consent to send the bill to conference, the opportunity they would have had to move to instruct the conferees to accept that amendment, and on that there would have been debate and a roll call. They were not satisfied with that opportunity. That would have made possible a direct vote on this question on the $24,000,000 amendment. We invited that. They did not see fit to accept the opportunity.

What is this $24,000,000 amendment that occasions this extraordinary method of sending an important appropriation bill to conference? I consider it a very short bill. It is of a legislative character, although in an appropriation bill, and reads:

BUREAU OF PROHIBITION

For increasing the enforcement force, $24,000,000, or such part thereof as the President may deem useful, to be allocated by the President, as he may see fit, to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act, and to remain available until June 30, 1930.

It should have borne four titles. It could well have been termed a bill to eradicate the recent wet splash on the political records of dry Democrats; or, secondly, to restore Bishop Cannon to the good graces of the southern Democracy; or, third, to condemn Secretary Mellon; or, fourth, to repudiate the administration of President Coolidge and embarrass the administration of President-elect Hoover. Those are the four frank purposes of this amendment.

DEMOCRATIC PARTY NEEDS REHABILITATION

We have just gone through a great national campaign that went down closer to the roots of the political feelings of the people of this Nation than any other campaign in 50 years. The results of that election in November were such that a former candidate for governor in Michigan, Mr. Frensdorf, a leader of the Democratic Party in my State, has openly advised the Democratic Party in Michigan to take a vacation for a number of years to come, and the trouble here is that many gentlemen in this House on the Democratic side from Southern States fear that the party down there will invite its leaders to take the vacation for several years to come, and so we have this $24,000,000 appropriation to rehabilitate the Democratic leaders.

I want now to quote a word from a distinguished Democrat, probably the most popular Democrat in the United States, certainly one Democrat who has been elected to office and who has never been defeated. I think he is not only popular, but I think he is one of the best political economists and best political strategists in the party. I refer to Will Rogers. Recently in an article in the Saturday Evening Post, in his letter to Al Smith, he said:

I don't know why it is, Al, but us Democrats just seem to have an uncanny premonition of sizing up a question and guessing wrong on it. It almost makes you think sometimes it is done purposely. You can't make outsiders believe it is not done purposely. For they don't think people could purposely make that many mistakes accidentally. And what makes it funny is we get the first pick.

Further, he says:

If a national question comes up, there is no sensible reason why we shouldn't be on the popular side instead of the right side all the time. Leave our old political leaders in the Senate, where they can't do anybody any good or harm, but hide 'em when a campaign is on; they been making the same speeches since they was weaned. * * * Get Raskob back on those Chevrolets again. He may know what Wall Street is going to do, but none of those guys have got a vote. We don't need a financier; we need a magician.

[Laughter.]

A few days ago he gave some good advice to his party on this present situation:

The Democrats are having a tough time finding somebody to give the $24,000,000 to. Mellon says, "I don't need it." Coolidge says, "Don't leave it on my doorstep." Hoover says, "My charity distributing days are over, don't sic it onto me." What they should do with it is to take $1,500,000 and pay off Raskob, Kenny, and Lehman, get Bishop Cannon a new typewriter, and take the other $22,000,000 and establish an endowment fund to take care of Senators whose political schemes backfired.

PROHIBITION THE ISSUE OF 1928

Anybody got any doubts what was the issue in that last campaign? The gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] is still here. He raised some question about it. Let me, for his benefit and others, cite the opinions of some distinguished gentlemen and authorities. From the New York Times, one of the great newspapers of this country and certainly not unfriendly to the Democratic Party in the last campaign, I quote from their editorial Voting on Prohibition in their issue of November 4, the last Sunday before the election:

Seldom in our history has the fate of one nonpartisan political issue been so closely bound up with the results of a national election as this year.

* * * * * * *

Next Tuesday, however, the issue between Smith and Hoover in the matter of prohibition is sharp and clear. Hoover proposes to attempt to correct the abuses of enforcement, but stands for the amendment and the Volstead law unalterably. Smith, pledged to attempt real enforcement of the law for the first time in its history, would amend the amendment and modify the law so as to permit the several States to undo prohibition. It is the first opportunity which Americans opposed to prohibition have ever had to register their opinion and make it felt by the politicians. If this opportunity is not grasped, years may pass before it comes again. All the dry forces are militantly for Hoover. They accept the issue as real.

* * * * * * *

If Smith is elected, liberalism will have a leader in a position of great power, carried into office by so widespread and popular an uprising that the barriers of reform—which Mr. Hughes describes as unscalable even by the people who set them there—will begin to crumble. If Hoover is elected, every antiprohibitionist who votes for him should acquiesce in present conditions without further complaint.

WET LEADERSHIP OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY

That was the issue of the campaign. Who was the leader of the Democratic organization in that campaign? Mr. Raskob was chairman of the Democratic Political Party and he is to-day. He is the official leader of that party. And what does he say about prohibition? Since he got rich selling automobiles by reason of the prosperity that has attended prohibition, his great mission is, as he proclaims it, "Ridding the country of the damnable affliction of prohibition."

That is why the party in Congress is attempting since its complete defeat on that issue and under that leadership to rehabilitate itself by this senseless, profligate appropriation of $24,000,000, with no idea of how it is to be used.

Furthermore, I call attention to what Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, Democratic candidate for Vice President, said on October 12, as carried in an Associated Press dispatch:

Governor Smith favors—and I am heartily in accord with his views—a change in the Volstead Act which would give a scientific definition of what is an intoxicating beverage. Under this change in the law such States as desire them would be permitted to have very light wines and beer.

Oh, if Bishop Cannon wants to snuggle up to these Democratic leaders he is welcome; if Scott McBride wants to do so, he can do so; but my devotion to prohibition goes back too many years to be led astray by such foolish leadership as now proposes this appropriation, and I will not be alarmed by any fear of misunderstanding of my position. I was acting chairman of the campaign that made dry my home county in 1910. I supported in person and in my newspaper the campaign that gave Michigan state-wide prohibition in 1916. I voted in this House to submit the eighteenth amendment and for the Volstead Act, and since have championed the law to the best of my ability and have observed it personally. I am concerned about results.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Not now; I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman if I could yield to anyone in my limited time.

Senator SIMMONS said in his speech at Newbern, N. C., October 12, the same day the candidate for Vice President, Mr. ROBINSON, made the statement I have quoted:

Governor Smith has deliberately made the question of State control of liquor traffic the paramount issue in this campaign. * * *

Whenever the question of prohibition has been heard, the men and women whose souls are wrapped up in that cause, a cause for which they struggled for more than a quarter of a century, and finally wrote into the Constitution, they are told that they are not opposed to Governor Smith because he wants to destroy this great reform, but because of their bigotry and sectarian prejudice.

I defy and spurn the man who attempts to drive them with the party lash, who seeks to deter them upon the grounds of party regularity from the free exercise of their righteous convictions.

Such was the issue, and the people rendered their verdict. They did not say that they voted to put Senator HARRIS, Mr. GARNER, and Mr. BYRNS, and Mr. CRISP, and Major LAGUARDIA in control of the situation; did not vote to give them the leadership.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret I can not now—but they voted to give the leadership to Herbert Hoover, who takes office as President of the United States on the 4th day of March. [Applause.] He who declared his opposition to the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and his desire to see it succeed.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I regret I can not.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Just for one question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Since I have referred to the gentleman I will yield to him if he wants to make a correction, but otherwise not.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman says Senator SIMMONS voted for this amendment—Senator SIMMONS, now in the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly; Senator SIMMONS wants to rehabilitate the Democratic Party. I want to say again, the design is to take money out of the Treasury to rehabilitate the Democratic Party.

SENATORIAL VOTE ON $24,000,000 AMENDMENT

Now, as to the amendment. What is this thing? It is to increase the prohibition enforcement fund by $24,000,000, to be allocated as the President desires, "to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act." That was adopted in the Senate with the votes of 13 Republicans, most of them fairly unfriendly to Secretary Mellon, and 39 Democrats and 1 Farmer-Labor. I will put them all in in the extension of my remarks. Against the amendment were 3 Democrats and 29 Republicans, the vote being as follows:

FOR HARRIS AMENDMENT (INCLUDING ANNOUNCEMENT OF ABSENTEES)

Republicans, 13: Brookhart, Capper, Couzens, Dale, Deneen, Frazier, McMaster, Norris, Nye, Pine, Sackett, Schall, and Vandenberg.

Democrats, 39: Ashurst, Barkley, Black, Blease, Bratton, Broussard, Caraway, Copeland, Dill, Edwards, Fletcher, George, Glass, Harris, Harrison, Hawes, Hayden, Heflin, McKellar, Mayfield, Neely, Overman, Pittman, Robinson of Arkansas, Ransdell, Sheppard, Simmons, Smith, Steck, Stephens, Swanson, Thomas of Oklahoma, Trammell, Tydings, Tyson, Wagner, Walsh of Massachusetts, Walsh of Montana, and Wheeler.

Farmer Labor, 1; Shipstead.

AGAINST HARRIS AMENDMENT (INCLUDING ANNOUNCEMENT OF ABSENTEES)

Republicans, 29: Bingham, Blaine, Borah, Burton, Curtis, Edge, Glenn, Fess, Goff, Gould, Hale, Hastings, Johnson, Jones, Keyes, Larrazolo, McNary, Metcalf, Moses, Oddie, Phipps, Reed of Pennsylvania, Shortridge, Smoot, Steiwer, Thomas of Idaho, Warren, Waterman, and Watson.

Democrats, 3: Bruce, Kendrick, and Reed of Missouri.

CURTIS, JONES, BORAH IN OPPOSITION

Among those Republicans opposing this extravagance in the Senate, this ill-considered spending of $24,000,000, were Senator CURTIS—no fairer, truer dry in the country [applause]; Senator JONES, of Washington, who in his last election was fought by the wets because of his dryness——

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER. It is against the rules of the House, which provide that a gentleman has no right to mention the names of individual Senators.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules of the House it is a breach of order to refer to debates or votes on the same subject in the other House.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have not questioned the motives which actuated them. I am just stating the roll call of the Senate, and I hope a statement of that kind is not uncomplimentary to any Senator.

Furthermore, I will mention Senator BORAH, who, when Senator HARRIS, Congressman GARNER, Congressman BYRNS, and all of these other Democrats were parading the country appealing for the election of a wet candidate for President——

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not think the gentleman from Michigan is complying with the rules of the House in mentioning these various Senators for their attitude in the Senate.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am within the rules, and I object to having my speech constantly interrupted by ill-founded points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is within his rights when he rises to make a point of order. It will not be taken out of the gentleman's time. The Chair wishes to state that it is a breach of the rules of the House to refer to the votes on the same subject in the other House. The Chair wishes to direct the attention of the Members of this House to the rule on this subject. It is found in the House Rules and Manual, paragraph 364, which reads:

It is a breach of order in debate to notice what has been said on the same subject in the other House, or the particular votes or majorities on it there; because the opinion of each House should be left to its own independency, not to be influenced by the proceedings of the other; and the quoting them might beget reflections leading to a misunderstanding between the two Houses.

In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is well taken. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed in order.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will be glad to. [Applause.]

I can speak of my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER] all right. In the last campaign, when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] and others that might be mentioned were appealing for the election of this wet candidate, a certain distinguished gentleman well known throughout the Nation, having as great a personal influence as any man in the Nation, whose official position and recent vote I am not permitted to mention under the rules of the House, was the "Plumed Knight" who led the fight for preservation of the eighteenth amendment and its effective enforcement; and he does not favor this $24,000,000 appropriation.

$24,000,000 CAN NOT BE USED IF APPROPRIATED

Now, the ridiculousness of the expenditure of this $24,000,000 appears when you study its language and learn that if you appropriate this money it can not be expended. It contributes nothing to prohibition enforcement. All it does is to transfer the dry leadership from the party that carried the banner for preservation of the eighteenth amendment to the party that sought to destroy it. [Applause.]

The language of the Senate amendment to the deficiency bill relating to a $24,000,000 fund, provides for the allocation of the fund by the President "to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act."

Under this language no part of the fund could be used by the Civil Service Commission. About 60 per cent of the present force of over 2,000 field officers have been appointed pursuant to the civil service act applicable to the Bureau of Prohibition. The recent examination for agents, which closed November 20, 1928, will not be completed for about a year, according to informal advices from the Civil Service Commission. It is, therefore, impracticable to appoint a large number of additional prohibition agents at this time as it would merely break down the civil-service procedure and place the service where it was prior to the passage of the civil service act. All of the men temporarily appointed would have to be examined and in large part displaced. Such a process would in no way benefit enforcement and would merely cause trouble. Hundreds of cases would be made and later dropped as the men left the service.

Under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1927, creating a Bureau of Customs and a Bureau of Prohibition in the Department of the Treasury, in subparagraph (c) of section 2 the Secretary of the Treasury is prohibited from delegating to the Bureau of Customs any rights or duties in connection with the administration of the national prohibition act, as amended, or any other law relating to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

The Coast Guard is likewise without specific authority to enforce the provisions of the national prohibition act.

It could not be allocated to the Coast Guard, where a study is now being made as to where and how more money could wisely be expended. Until that is done and we enact the necessary legislation authorizing units under the proposed expenditure, the money could not be spent for the Coast Guard, and this amendment grants no such legislative authority.

Furthermore, in the Department of Justice, there is no place to use any great amount of this money unless you also enact legislation. They may need more judges. The additional judges that were given have appreciably reduced the number of prohibition criminal cases pending in the last year. If more judges are wanted, they could not be secured through this appropriation. Congress must first act on legislation to create the judgeships and many of those bills are now pending in the Senate. The money could be used to employ more assistant district attorneys, but I am to-day advised by the Department of Justice that these appointments, under the law, can only be made on request of the Federal judges and that they have appointed every assistant district attorney that has been requested and they have never been handicapped by lack of money for this purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. CRAMTON. These defects emphasize the necessity of proceeding in a constructive manner in determining what the needs of each particular service may be. Any other procedure would inevitably result in a waste of funds and the benefits, by way of actual enforcement, would be very questionable and really negligible.

MELLON'S STATEMENT ON THE $24,000,000

Secretary Mellon in his letter made a statement—and I say that Secretary Mellon has never been hostile to law enforcement, as I have had opportunity to know through personal contact with him in connection with the reorganization of the Prohibition Bureau, and he is honest—if you will read his letter any fair-minded man who is not seeking political results will find that he well points out the unwisdom of appropriating $24,000,000 for which nobody has asked. In his letter of January 21 to Bishop Cannon he said, in part:

As I pointed out in my letter of January 12 to Senator WARREN, prohibition enforcement does not rest solely upon the Bureau of Prohibition, but its success depends largely on the cooperation afforded by the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, and the border patrol, and, what is even of more vital importance, on the possibility of bringing to trial cases prepared by the Prohibition Bureau and ready for trial. What I endeavored to point out in my letter to Senator WARREN is that the Harris amendment makes the additional funds available to the Prohibition Bureau only and restricts the uses by that bureau, with no discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury. There are now 21,000 liquor cases pending in the Federal courts and causing congestion, with no relief in sight.

The Customs Service needs additional guards in the principal ports and the border patrol needs strengthening, while in so far as the Coast Guard is concerned, Admiral Billard is at present undertaking a survey as to the ships needed to replace a number of destroyers whose usefulness has been pretty nearly exhausted, and is prepared to recommend an increase in the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard. The Harris amendment would not make funds available for any of these purposes, nor could the additional money provided for be used for the educational purposes which you emphasize in your telegram.

Under these circumstances, can it be fairly said that an appropriation of $25,000,000, made with these restrictions, would of itself constitute an intelligent and effective means of promoting prohibition enforcement?

I note that in your telegram you suggest that the restrictions be removed and that $25,000,000 be made available to the Secretary of the Treasury to spend as he sees fit. This, of course, is not the Harris amendment now pending in Congress; and aside from the fact that it would make no provision whatsoever for relieving the congestion in the courts, which to-day constitutes one of the major problems in the field of prohibition enforcement. I want to suggest whether you consider it good practice to place so vast a sum in the hands of a public official with unlimited discretion as to its use? It makes no difference whether that official be the Secretary of the Treasury or some other chief of an executive department of Government, I do not believe that adequate protection of the public interests and the proper safeguards that should always surround the expenditure of public funds can fairly be said to have been provided for if an appropriation of this character is made. Such a program would break down the safeguards of the Budget system, and the effective and proper control which Congress exercises over the expenditure of the public funds. I think that upon second consideration you will realize that this is not a minor question but a fundamental one, and that in the long run, whether in the prohibition field or in any other field of government, infinitely more is lost than gained if for the sake of accomplishing immediately a purpose, no matter how desirable, a fundamental principle of good government and sound practice is violated.

LIQUOR LAWS FAIL IN NONPROHIBITION COUNTRIES

They say the law is not enforced in this country. The liquor traffic does not obey the law in any country at any time, and whatever the form of the law, it is not fully effective. I recently read in an Associated Press dispatch how Ontario is proceeding to limit shipments to our country because they come back to them and go through their bootleg channels. The item reads:

DETROIT, November 22.—It was reported to-day that a decision by W. D. Euler, Canadian Minister of National Revenue, to limit the number of liquor export docks along the Canadian side of the Detroit river will result in closing of 20 docks maintained by small exporters.

Euler's decision, according to the newspaper, followed a conference with Sir Henry Drayton, chairman of the Ontario Liquor Control Board.

The reason ascribed by the newspaper for reducing the number of docks to 10 is that Ontario government officials have found that much of the liquor consigned to Detroit has been finding its way back into bootleg channels in Canadian border cities.

I find in another Associated Press dispatch that Bucharest has discovered that half the population are drinking moonshine liquor:

HALF OF CITY FOUND USING MOONSHINE—BUCHAREST OFFICERS SEIZE WINE MADE OF ANILINE DYE AND SACCHARINE

BUCHAREST, RUMANIA, December 1.—The government has discovered that half the population of this wine-drinking city has been consuming moonshine and other adulterated liquors. An epidemic of acute eye troubles has been traced to the synthetic wines and it has been estimated that the moonshiners have taken in more than $500,000.

Analysis of the fraudulent wine showed that it contained only 1 per cent of grape juice. Aniline dye, saccharine, and low-grade alcohol formed the principal basis of the concoction.

I find in the paper this morning that Yugoslavia intends to take strong measures against alcoholic drinks, even to the extent of arresting those who drink, because of so much excessive drinking in that nonprohibition country, according to another Associated Press dispatch:

PLANS LIMIT ON LIQUOR—YUGOSLAV GOVERNMENT TO BAN EXCESSIVE RUM DRINKING

BELGRADE, YUGOSLAVIA, January 30.—The new government intends to take strong measures against alcoholic drinks. While total prohibition is not contemplated, the government, being appalled at the effects attributed to excessive drinking, has decided to make drunkenness a crime.

Anyone found drunk in a public place will be severely punished, especially if the offender is a civil servant. Certain repressive measures included already in the new penal code will be greatly strengthened.

PROHIBITION HAS PROVEN ITSELF HERE

We lack much of having the enforcement desired in this country, but we are making good progress. Rum row on the Atlantic coast has practically disappeared, the work on the land borders is being better organized, and unlawful diversions of industrial alcohol are being greatly reduced. Those are Federal problems. The States and the cities have their share of the responsibility and can not afford to much longer neglect that responsibility. Better enforcement will bring better results, but even with such enforcement as we have had, Irving Fisher, professor of economics at Yale; Henry Ford; Babson, the great statistician; and other great authorities agree that it has proven itself as a great industrial and social benefactor. This is shown by the fact that deposits in savings banks increased from thirteen billion in 1919 to twenty-six billion in 1926, and the number of such accounts from 29,000,000 to 48,000,000. The number of high-school students increased from 312 per thousand of children of 14 to 17 to 473 per thousand. The life insurance increased from $334 per capita to $543. At the same time the people were using much more generally the necessities and the luxuries of life.

W. C. T. U. AND METHODIST BOARD WILLING TO WAIT FOR HOOVER

Our Democratic friends would have you think that all the dry leadership of the country is clamoring for this amendment. It is only those excitable bishops of Virginia and these excitable Democrats who are insisting on it.

As a matter of fact, the people I most admire are those devoted prohibition advocates, those sainted women who for years have battled against overwhelming odds to outlaw the saloon and who in this last campaign contributed so much to the splendid result. I refer to the Women's Christian Temperance Union. [Applause.] Those women are not concerned about politics. They have no fences to mend, but they are keeping their heads and they are not asking for this $24,000,000. They trust Hoover and are willing to wait a few weeks for him. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] was interested to know their attitude, no statement having come from them, and so he wired to Mrs. Ella A. Boole, president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, asking her position, and she sends this telegram in reply, which I have secured his permission to read to you:

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has taken no stand in the present confused situation about the $24,000,000 deficiency appropriation.

Listen!

Because we are confident the new administration, after careful study, will have its own plans and will present its own needs for money.

[Applause.]

And let me say to any drys that if they will just follow Herbert Hoover's leadership they will have a dry record upon which they can go into any dry district of this country. [Applause.]

That is not all. I sought an opinion from the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, nothing having been volunteered by that board, and Doctor Wilson in reply expressed also their desire not to add to the existing controversy or become a party to it. He did say, however:

We take it for granted that the appropriation will not be effectuated either because of disagreement between the two Houses or because of presidential veto, and we trust that as soon as possible Congress can enact well-conceived legislation allocating necessary funds to the various departments on the basis of a thorough understanding of the needs. We take it that such appropriation must necessarily include consideration of a possible enlargement of the judicial establishment of the United States Government.

The complete letter and extract from Doctor Wilson follow:

BOARD OF TEMPERANCE, PROHIBITION, AND PUBLIC MORALS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1929.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CRAMTON: In reply to your inquiry by telephone will say that the inclosed short comment on the proposal to appropriate twenty-four or twenty-five million dollars for the purpose of prohibition enforcement appeared in the Clip Sheet of January 21. At that time, however, the proposal was to make this available to the Prohibition Unit only, and what we said under those circumstances would not now apply.

It is our judgment that any statement by us at this time would necessarily be subject to such misrepresentation as to be injurious to the board and to the cause. We would like, therefore, to refrain from participating in the discussion.

We take it for granted that the appropriation will not be effectuated either because of disagreement between the two Houses or because of presidential veto, and we trust that as soon as possible Congress can enact well-conceived legislation allocating necessary funds to the various departments on the basis of a thorough understanding of the needs. We take it that such appropriation must necessarily include consideration of a possible enlargement of the judicial establishment of the United States Government.

With best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE TRUE WILSON,
General Secretary.

TWENTY-FIVE MILLION DOLLARS

The suggestion that the appropriation made available to the Prohibition Unit be increased by $25,000,000 is an evidence of a sincere determination on the part of Congress that the law be enforced.

We do not believe that $25,000,000 can be wisely used by the Prohibition Unit at the present time. If and when measures are taken to relieve congestion in the Federal courts, substantial additional sums might be used to the advantage of the country.

However, there is no doubt that the funds appropriated for prohibition enforcement are insufficient. Several million dollars, at least, could be used in educational and investigation activities.

Evidently the whole field of law enforcement should be thoroughly studied and a conclusion should be reached with regard to the necessities of the Department of Justice, the Coast Guard, and the Prohibition Unit. Whatever appropriations are necessary for effective coordinated effort should eventually be made and no doubt will be made. Those sums, however, should cover only the legitimate activities of the Federal Government. The insincere proposal of Senator BRUCE to appropriate $300,000,000 for the enforcement of the prohibition law by the Federal Government was simply a publicity "stunt" in keeping with the fanatical record of that retiring Senator. (Extract from Clip Sheet.)

Not all the dry leadership has gone to rocking the boat. Why should it when for the first time a President has been elected on the platform of preserving and making effective the eighteenth amendment, and in a few weeks he will be inaugurated?

ILL-ADVISED APPROPRIATION WOULD BE DISASTROUS TO DRY CAUSE

The superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League in my State has telegraphed me to support this $24,000,000. I will not admit that he has any better knowledge of the situation here than I have. I will not yield to him in my devotion to this cause. In my sober judgment, the appropriation of this $24,000,000, which no official of the Government has asked for and with no program here for its expenditure, would be a setback to the dry cause that would be disastrous on the eve of the dry administration of Herbert Hoover. So I hope that every dry, and I hope that every man who has any idea of good business administration of the Government will support the demand to send this bill to conference without tying the hands of the conferees. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, this is an opportunity I have long sought. Now is the time for every man to declare himself on the question of prohibition.

Gentlemen, the last election is over. This question of Raskob and Al Smith is only a red herring which the demoralized drys are now drawing across the path.

Why, the great leader of the prohibition forces in the House of Representatives, the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], talks about prohibition in Yugoslavia, in Rumania, and in Ontario, but not one word does he say about the disgraceful conditions in the State of Michigan.

The question here is not on the rule. The question here is not on instructing the conferees. The question now is to demonstrate that prohibition is impossible of enforcement. Whether you appropriate $24,000,000 to-day or not, you will have to do it eventually, and, as I have stated on the floor of the House so many times in the last 10 years, it will cost you $200,000,000 and $300,000,000 a year before you can convince "those honest and sincere women of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union," referred to so solicitously by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], that the so-called prohibition leaders and Anti-Saloon League are faking and to whom they are making misrepresentations as to its success, that prohibition enforcement has completely broken down. It is necessary to have additional funds to prove to some who are not yet convinced that prohibition simply can not be enforced.

I believe the only cure for prohibition is prohibition. We have to apply a homeopathic treatment. Will any of the drys stand up to-day and say that we have enforcement? Do you want to countenance the present disgraceful condition?

I admit that my purpose in voting for this appropriation may be different from that of the dry Members of the House. I vote for it because I have taken the stand and the attitude that we must convince the American people that prohibition is a failure, and the only way to do it is by attempting to enforce it.

Do you not see how the drys are being demoralized? Do you not see how we have broken their ranks? Do you believe for a moment that the Anti-Saloon League wants to see this money appropriated? Not at all; McBride did not come out for this appropriation until he was sure that CRAMTON and COOPER and the rest of the dry leaders here had enough votes to vote it down. So McBride will go to one-half the people and say, "Why, we were for it," and the dry leaders will go to the other half and say that they were against it. They are playing the old Anti-Saloon League game.

Why, it was stated we should not embarrass the President elect. It was stated this was intended to embarrass him? Are you afraid to trust Herbert Hoover with $24,000,000? I am not. I have confidence in the honesty and the ability of Herbert Hoover and I am not afraid to trust him with this $24,000,000, and I know that Herbert Hoover is big enough that when we give him this money, after he will have tried this "noble experiment," he will come back to the Congress and say, "I can not enforce this law; the law can not be enforced, and the next best thing to do is to deal with it constructively and bring about the necessary modification that will make the law possible of enforcement." [Applause.]

The situation to-day marks a turning point in the history of prohibition. It is a condition that many of us who realize that prohibition as a national proposition was not feasible and was not enforceable anticipated. We opposed it from the first day of its enactment. It can not be said, however, that we opposed it by refusing appropriations or hampering its enforcement. For 10 years I have constantly advised my colleagues that the law was not being enforced. I have repeatedly brought to the attention of Congress case after case, instance after instance of official graft and corruption. I have exposed here on the floor of the House wholesale violations running into millions of dollars. I have brought here facts and figures showing a universal and general disregard of the law. To-day the proposition is: Are the drys, the supporters of prohibition, the champions of prohibition, ready to admit defeat or are they ready to have or to take one more chance and see what they can do? Oh, gentlemen, you will remember the early days of prohibition up to only a very few months ago, the dry leaders of this House taking the floor and demanding enforcement, asking for appropriations to carry out the mandate of the prohibition law.

You can still remember the applause which followed every statement asking for enforcement. I pointed out so many times, and I repeat at the risk of becoming tiresome, that there is no attempt made by the Federal Government to enforce prohibition in many of the States of the Union. Of the 500 largest cities in the United States, 480 of them have never seen a single, solitary prohibition agent. If this is a national law, it is a law for all of the United States, and not only a law for the city of New York, the city of Chicago, the city of St. Louis, or the city of Philadelphia. It can not be said after 10 years of trial that the department does not know how to spend the increased appropriations. The testimony of General Andrews, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, still a matter of record, the recent testimony of Doctor Doran, Commissioner of Prohibition, indicate that the present appropriations are insufficient, and not even enough to permit them to scratch the surface.

The drys to-day are demoralized and routed; they are divided. It is the first big defeat that they have encountered; but, gentlemen, they have not yet surrendered. We must go through this costly process of appropriating additional $24,000,000, and next year perhaps $50,000,000 more. The present cost of prohibition is in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. It will soon be, no matter what we do to-day, $100,000,000 and $150,000,000 a year. To commence to patrol the Canadian border, the Mexican border, and the semblance of a Coast Guard along the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans will run the appropriations to $300,000,000. The dry Congressmen know that, the professional drys know that; but there are a great many people in this country—sincere drys—who are being deceived, who are being told that prohibition is a success, who are being told that the law is being enforced—these good people are not yet convinced. Costly as it may be, we must appropriate additional funds. Let the professional drys, let the dry Congressmen, try anything that they will, employ as large a force as they desire, and the conditions will be just as rotten then as they are to-day. There is not a State, a city, county, or village in which liquor is not sold. The consumption is so great that a conservative estimate fixes an amount of $1,000,000 a day which passes hands in the shape of corruption and graft to Federal, State, and municipal officials. Such a condition is intolerable. Such a state of affairs is disgraceful and demoralizing to established government.

What is the position of the drys to-day? If they should take these funds, the responsibility is upon them in making good or admitting that prohibition is a failure. If they refuse the additional funds, they countenance the existing condition, which stands as a living example and the positive proof that prohibition is a failure. It is either admitting failure to-day or admitting failure to-morrow. Naturally a good many drys run to cover. Their only stock in trade is at stake. If they can delay the day, their political power is extended just so long. They will vote down this appropriation, then return to their home towns and talk about terrible wet New York and talk about only the aliens violating the law, and continue to tell their constituents what a success prohibition is. Given the additional appropriation, responsibility of enforcing the law rests upon them, and I again repeat they must make good or admit failure. I care not whether this additional fund was injected into the bill for political reasons or not. It goes to show the danger of prohibition, its enormous cost, how it will disarrange all budgetary arrangements, how it will make further reduction of taxes impossible, how it will impose unheard of burden on the shoulders of the taxpayers, how it will disrupt organized government. Naturally, the drys are in confusion to-day, and it would behoove the wets to keep the drys agoing, to keep their ranks broken, to press hard now that we have them on the run. Unfortunately, the wets are divided. Naturally, every Member has the right to vote according to his best judgment. I can not see, however, how any wet desirous of bringing about a change by proper legislative or constitutional channels can fail to avail himself of this opportunity. It is true that by voting for these appropriations a Member from a wet district might be misunderstood. It is true that the full meaning and importance of this appropriation may not be generally understood. Every statesman must take the risk of being misunderstood temporarily in the course of bringing about reforms and changes which he seeks. I know that people will come into my district and misrepresent my attitude. They did that last year, but my constituents are too intelligent to be misled by any misstatement or by deliberate lies, whether the speaker is drunk or sober when he makes those statements. I am not afraid of facing the situation. I am sent here to bring about a modification of prohibition, and I may properly use every technical, parliamentary, legislative, and lawful means available to bring about that change.

The people that I represent want law reform, not law violations. So the wets to-day have this opportunity presented to themselves. As we divide, we take that course which will hereafter classify us in this great fight. By voting for this appropriation, we act as statesmen bent upon bringing about a change in the existing intolerable conditions. By voting against it, one is willing to be classified as a congressional gigolo willing to dance at the snap of a bootlegger's fingers. [Laughter.]

There is a difference in being a wet seeking to bring about a modification of prohibition, and simply being a wet willing to make things easier for the unlawful sale and consumption of poison alcohol.

The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury either to Senator WARREN or to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House] was anything but convincing. If after 10 years he does not know how to use additional funds, then he should come out and say frankly that prohibition is a failure, and as part of the administration ask the President of the United States to inform Congress of the entire breakdown of prohibition, the impossibility of its enforcement, and for legislative action to remedy the existing condition by bringing about a safe and sane policy of liquor control which will permit the sale of wines and beer and stop the present wholesale consumption of hard liquor and poison alcohol. If he is not willing to take that stand at the present time, then, as I pointed out in my remarks of January 23, 1929, he can use every penny of the additional $24,000,000 in an attempt to enforce the law, or he can use $3,000,000 of this appropriation right in the city of Washington without in the slightest creating inconvenience to "official" Washington. He can use several million dollars in the city of Detroit, whose Representatives in Congress, known as dry leaders, to-day are opposing this appropriation. He can use several million dollars in denaturing plants and supervision of permittees using poison alcohol and prevent hundreds of thousands of gallons—yes, millions of gallons—of poison alcohol being diverted into beverages.

As a wet who is convinced that the present prohibition law is a failure, I shall vote for this appropriation in the course of trying out this so-called experiment and convincing the American people that, regardless of the millions of dollars that are being spent, it can not be enforced, and that a modification of the law is not only necessary but inevitable. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, it has not been necessary for me to consult with Doctor McBride, or the Women's Christian Temperance Union, or Doctor Wilson and his board of Methodist "moralists," or with anybody else as to how I should vote. I could not very well consult with any bootlegger because all the bootleggers are in the Republican Party. They constitute the nucleus of the Republican organization in my city of New York. Every bootlegger voted for Herbert Hoover. [Laughter and applause.]

The chairman of the Rules Committee, of which I am a member, has said that there are four classes of people who favor this amendment. He said the first class is composed of the hysterical "drys." If I am hysterical at all I certainly am not aridly so. [Laughter.] I think he meant the Members who are afraid of Doctor McBride—I do not know what kind of a "doctor" he is, but he certainly has a lot of sick patients on his hands to-day. [Laughter.] Then the distinguished chairman said the second class are the bitter wets, who tried the other day to adopt the amendment for $250,000,000 more to enforce prohibition. As you all know, I have been somewhat opposed to prohibition. I voted and spoke against that $250,000,000 appropriation, as I am going to vote to-day for the rule and against this $24,000,000 appropriation. [Applause.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] said the third class was composed of Members who wanted to rehabilitate themselves in their districts. That can not possibly include me.

Then he said the fourth class were those who wanted to embarrass the new President. I can assure him I would not do that. The leaders of my party have no intentions of doing so. We wish him success and hope he brings to this Government the best administration—and God knows we need it—that the country has ever had. [Applause.]

Now, there is a certain atmosphere here in which men are struggling between fear and doubt—fear of the lash, fear of this McBride, who, in Collier's of last week, said to Herbert Hoover: "If you do not do as we tell you to do, four years from now you are going to be greatly embarrased"; a common, vulgar person threatening the head of the Government of the United States!

My position now is and always has been that I do not believe the American people want this law enforced. I do not know of a solitary individual who wants it enforced against himself or his friends. I do not believe that any amount of money will enforce it. I want Members of the Eightieth Congress to read the debates in the Seventieth Congress, and they will, I am sure, look back and say, "How could they ever think of it?" Because I am confident that in the Eightieth Congress not a single dollar will be appropriated to enforce the prohibition law. I am sure that is the way this law is going to be "repealed" and "modified."

There is much talk of figures. Somebody has said here to-day that only 15 per cent of the people of this country are wet. Let me say that no law passed by this legislative body or any other legislature can be enforced if 15 per cent of the people are opposed to it—or even 10 per cent. Assume you have ten or fifteen million people—I think the more exact figures will be fifty or sixty million people—but let us assume there are only 10,000,000 people opposed to it. You can not enforce it, because there must be something fundamentally wrong with any law when any considerable number of people are opposed to it. You do not have that trouble with any other laws. You do not have to appropriate $35,000,000 to enforce any other law. I would not vote for $24,000,000 to enforce any law, no matter what it provided, because I know that the mere fact that you require that much money to enforce it is proof positive that your law is fundamentally wrong and not consonant with the wishes of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and in that connection I also ask unanimous consent to incorporate as a part of my remarks a telegram from Judge Johnson J. Hays, of the middle district of North Carolina, bearing on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAMSEYER). The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks and in that connection incorporate a telegram. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, no question now before the American people is of greater importance than that of prohibition. It affects the moral, social, and industrial life of the Nation to a greater degree perhaps than any other subject.

In the recent national campaign, while both parties endeavored to prevent the prohibition issue being made paramount, yet it was perhaps more widely discussed and had a greater bearing upon the result than any other one issue.

The subject under consideration to-day is whether or not the Congress will take a forward step toward better enforcement of this much-discussed law—whether or not it will provide additional funds for its effective enforcement. While there are honest differences of opinion as to the success or failure of the prohibition law, every fair-minded person must admit that up to the present time it has never had a fair trial. Those who have opposed the law from its inception—and I do not question their honesty—stoutly maintain that the law can not be enforced and that it is a loss of effort and waste of money to make further attempts in the direction of enforcement. But in my judgment a great majority of the American people believe in the law. They believe with partial enforcement it has accomplished much good, and with better enforcement the benefits of the law will be much greater and more fully realized.

If the law is ever to succeed and its ordained purpose to be accomplished, violators of the law must be apprehended, tried, and punished. Probable apprehension, speedy trial, and severe punishment must stare violators in the face before the law will ever succeed and accomplish the results for which it was enacted.

It is the duty of Congress to provide adequate funds whereby those who willfully and persistently violate this law can and will be apprehended. It is then the duty of the executive department of the Government to carry out the will of Congress, and in so far as it is humanly possible and reasonable bring the violators into court, and if this is done I am certain within a very short time the merits of the law will be fully established and its purpose and intention vindicated.

If the Congress provides the machinery by placing at the disposal of the Treasury Department the necessary funds for the effective enforcement of the law, I have no doubt whatever but that the judicial arm of the Government—the Federal courts—will administer sufficient punishment to make the law the same success and give it the same dignity and standing as other laws.

In the State of North Carolina, which I have the honor in part to represent, the alibi of those in charge of enforcement, and I believe it is a just one, is that the force is not sufficient to cope with those who violate the law. With 100 counties in our State there are only about 30 men employed to enforce the prohibition law. Everyone knows who is at all familiar with the subject that this force can not, no matter how diligently and honestly it strives to do so, bring to the bar of justice any considerable number of those who make it a business and earn their livelihood by the illicit manufacture of and traffic in intoxicating liquors. Certainly not fewer than two men on the average to each county can make any reasonable progress whatever toward the enforcement of the law, as the Government enforcement officers have to contend with a highly organized, intelligent, and well-financed group of offenders.

It is frequently charged by those who oppose prohibition that further appropriations should not be made for the reason that those employed in the enforcement of this law are unfaithful, dishonest, and do not seriously attempt to enforce the law. In other words, that they accept bribes and close their eyes to the flagrant violations.

My knowledge of those who are engaged in the very difficult work of apprehending and bringing to trial the professional moonshiners and bootleggers is that this wholesale denunciation and criticism is unwarranted. They certainly have a very difficult position to fill, and in my State, I believe, as a whole they are as faithful and honest as other enforcement officers.

If the executive department of the Government will strengthen its force, capture those who are violating the prohibition law, the courts in our State will adequately punish the guilty. When this is done the violations will not be so frequent, and fewer men will take the risk of engaging in the business.

Judge Johnson J. Hayes, of the middle district of North Carolina, a very able and upright judge, has wired Senator OVERMAN urging that this amendment be adopted and that the appropriation of $24,000,000 be made. Judge Hayes was for a considerable time solicitor in the State of North Carolina, and it was his duty to prosecute all those who were charged with criminal offenses. In the prosecution of the State docket he became acquainted with the violators of our State prohibition law, and is perhaps as familiar with the prohibition subject in all its relations and aspects as any man in the United States, and he maintains the one great need is larger appropriations and more men with which to run down and bring to justice those who are professional violators of the national prohibition law.

Judge Hayes's telegram to Senator OVERMAN:

> Trust you will use your influence to secure passage of the Harris prohibition appropriation. This amount should treble the present number of agents. In my opinion, this is wise legislation and will meet the necessities in rural communities such as our district.

Those who oppose this amendment do so under the pretense that the money can not be successfully and effectively used until greater knowledge is gained of the real situation. However, if they have not within the past eight years become familiar with the true situation, they certainly never will do so. There are many who believe prohibition will not be enforced successfully while left in the Treasury Department. A recent communication by the Secretary of the Treasury to Congress has confirmed many in that belief. The American people are determined, however, that the prohibition law shall be enforced and that those in authority must be left with no excuse for half-hearted, insincere efforts in the direction of law enforcement.

Mr. Speaker, it is the old subterfuge of those who try to conceal their own duplicity to allege that those differing with them are insincere. There has been an obvious manifestation of that spirit here to-day. Those opposing this appropriation are inconsistent when they hypocritically profess that they are sincere in their desire to see the prohibition law enforced and that those who differ with them are trying to play politics. It is always good politics for any party or any individual to do right.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes. I gladly yield to my friend Judge CRISP.

Mr. CRISP. The country manifested its approval of Mr. Hoover, and I have confidence in him. If this amendment should be carried and the $24,000,000 appropriated, will this not be the effect of it: If Mr. Hoover, as President, desires the money to enforce the law and he sees where he can advantageously use it, he will use it. If he does not, he will not use it and it will remain in the Treasury and none of it will be expended. But it will simply evidence to him and the country that Congress desires to give him all the money he may need to enforce the law.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his very illuminating and timely statement. There is not any doubt but what Mr. Hoover, the incoming President, can use this money if he sees fit to do so. If not, it can remain in the Treasury.

While there is nothing in the record of Mr. Hoover up to the time he became a candidate for the Presidency to indicate that he is a real prohibitionist, yet from the declarations he made during the campaign one would infer he is in sympathy with the law and will endeavor to have it enforced. Up to the time he became a candidate, so far as I have been able to ascertain, he had never identified himself with the prohibition cause, never made a prohibition speech, or written a magazine article on the subject of prohibition. He had no record whatever as to prohibition. He had been connected with the present administration, and so far as is known was in sympathy with all its policies. In fact, he so expressed himself in his campaign utterances, and everyone knows that the present administration has made no earnest, determined effort to enforce the prohibition law. I will not say it has not been honest, as charged by some, as I do not question a man's honesty unless I have the greatest and gravest provocation to do so.

In my judgment a great majority of the American people are determined that the prohibition law shall have a fair trial and that a much greater effort shall be made in the future than in the past to have the law enforced, and everyone at all familiar with the subject knows that the first step essential in a campaign for better enforcement is an adequate appropriation to carry forward the work in a determined and successful manner.

Doctor Doran, Commissioner of Prohibition, has said that more money is necessary for the better enforcement of the law. Those in charge of the Coast Guard and who are endeavoring to prevent the smuggling of intoxicating liquors in this country plead as an excuse for their failure that they do not have sufficient boats at their command with which to run down those who are engaged in the violation of the law along the Atlantic coast. I would much rather have the word of Doctor Doran, Admiral Willard, and Judge Johnson J. Hayes, who know by actual experience and by direct contact what is needed for the proper administration of the law, than the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, a man whose time and attention is occupied by numerous other duties and responsibilities and who gives little or no attention to the enforcement of prohibition. In fact, Mr. Mellon, before he became Secretary of the Treasury, is reputed to have been the largest distiller in the world, and his heart has never been in the work so far as enforcement of this law is concerned.

If this appropriation is not made now, Mr. Hoover, when he becomes President on the 4th of March, will find himself without sufficient funds to proceed with the enforcement of prohibition. It is understood that an extra session of Congress, if one is called, will deal only with the matters of tariff and farm relief, therefore, the question of prohibition will not receive consideration and no appropriation will be made before Congress meets next December in regular session. Of course, it will be several months after that before anything will be done. If the money is provided now the new administration will have no excuse. If a survey is needed or a committee is to be appointed to look into the matter and make a report to Congress, it can be done during the summer, so when Congress meets in December all the information will be at hand, and the President can make his recommendation and Congress can proceed in the light of the facts that have been adduced. There is everything to gain and nothing to lose by making the appropriation now and those who are trying to prevent the passage of this bill, whether intentionally or unintentionally, are playing into the hands and strengthening the arms of those trying to discredit the law and making it harder and more difficult as the days go by for it to ever be enforced.

The issue will not down. It must be squarely met and in my opinion the great body of the American people who believe in prohibition and believe it can be enforced will hold in disgust and contempt any further half-hearted sham battles with respect to the enforcement of this most important law.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, my own attitude toward this prohibition question is I think fairly well known. I was a Member of the House in 1913, when an attempt was made to send the prohibition amendments to the States. We had a majority, but not two-thirds, and it went no further. I voted for prohibition at that time. I voted for the present eighteenth amendment when it was sent to the States. I voted for the Volstead law for the enforcement of that amendment. I have voted and expect to vote for every appropriation for the enforcement of that law, but I shall not vote for the $24,000,000 proposed in the present amendment. [Applause.]

No estimates have been made as to any amount needed that would include this appropriation. At the beginning of this session of Congress, after the President had sent us his annual message, he did send a separate message giving estimates of the amount needed for the whole executive branch of the Government, including the Prohibition Bureau. For that bureau the estimate was $13,400,000. Including the amount used in prohibition work by other organizations, such as the Coast Guard, the customs officers, the border patrol, the Federal courts, apportioning the amount spent by each of them in prohibition cases, the total amount spent for prohibition is something like $30,000,000 or $35,000,000 a year. That is not a staggering sum. It would not appall me if we appropriated twice as much.

If no estimates have come to us from the executive branch of the Government, which is the recognized mode of bringing appropriation questions before the House, the only approved mode since we adopted the Budget system, how did this proposal originate?

Mr. Doran, when he appeared before the Appropriations Committee, was asked whether he could enforce prohibition, whether the work of the Prohibition Bureau could be effectively done with the amount the Budget Bureau estimated to be necessary, $13,400,000. He said, "Yes." When he was further inquired of, he did say that if Congress wanted to change its whole policy and go into general police work, it would take $300,000,000 and a network of United States courts. Everybody knows that the general police work of the country is not administered by the National Government but by the States and municipalities; and the National Government has no authority to do it except as the eighteenth amendment gives it police power in the one matter of prohibition. Some one seized on that statement that $300,000,000 would be necessary for the general police work of the country, with a great network of United States courts, and, whether intentionally or otherwise, misrepresented the statement of Mr. Doran. When the Treasury appropriation bill came back to the House from the Senate it had in it an amendment increasing the amount for prohibition to $270,000,000, if my memory is correct. The rules of the House forbid me to say that that amendment was offered in the Senate in a spirit of sarcasm, and therefore I shall not say it. The amendment disappeared in the conference committee. Now, we have a proposal in the deficiency appropriation bill for $24,000,000, in addition to the $13,400,000 asked for by the President, and for this additional sum no estimate has been made, no information has been given as to how it might be expended, and the head of the prohibition enforcement bureau says, I am told, that he would not know how to spend it. It would provide no additional judges, because the number of Federal judges is fixed by law. It would not increase the number of courts and it is in the courts that the congestion is found. The number of officers appointed in the various divisions and departments and bureaus of the executive branch of the Government is fixed by law, and no legislation is proposed by which the number would be increased.

It is proposed simply to throw $24,000,000 out into the dark in the hope that it may somehow hit the bootlegger and inflict a deadly wound on his unlawful traffic. I do not propose to throw money away in that fashion. I will vote for another proposal among the Senate amendments to this bill if I have a chance. It asks for $250,000 to pay the expenses of a commission of inquiry which it is expected Mr. Hoover will appoint for the purpose of investigating the whole question and proposing the best methods of enforcing the eighteenth amendment. When the investigation is made, if it is shown that twenty-four millions or twice that sum would be necessary to enforce prohibition, I shall vote for it. As I have said, my own attitude on the question is well known. People have told me that if I vote against the appropriation that my dry friends will misunderstand it. For two reasons, my dry friends will not misunderstand it. Those people have confidence in me and will not misunderstand my attitude. Secondly, if they had no confidence in me, they are intelligent people and will understand the situation when they know the facts. Being on the ground and in closer contact with the legislative situation in Congress, I know the facts just now better than they do, and I vote according to my own judgment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina requested me to take charge of the time, and I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that some of those who have discussesd this question have sought to give it a political turn. [Laughter.] I am particularly surprised at the remarkable speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], my friend and a gentleman for whom I have a very great respect. Really after all, it was the only kind of a speech the gentleman from Michigan could make on the subject, because heretofore he has assumed the leadership of the dry forces in the Congress. But the gentleman in his remarks put himself in the rather unfortunate position of voting to refuse to trust the President, in whose election he was very largely influential, with $24,000,000 if he needs it in order to carry out the promise that he made to the people that he would enforce this law if he was elected President of the United States. [Applause.] The gentleman from Michigan says that there are some at the other end of the Capitol, and possibly some in the House who are seeking to rehabilitate the Democratic party by supporting this amendment. The gentleman referred to a number at the other end of the Capitol who had supported this amendment, but he failed to refer to his own two distinguished Republican United States Senators from the State of Michigan who heartily supported it as the RECORD shows, and I wondered if those gentlemen are to be accused of endeavoring to rehabilitate the party to which they do not belong. You can not throw dust in the eyes of the people of this country and those who believe in honest enforcement of this law whether they are wet or dry by statements of that kind. This is a plain, simple proposition. It has been testified before your committee that the enforcement bureaus have not sufficient funds to enforce the law.

Doctor Doran stated that he needed more money to properly enforce it. Admiral Billard, head of the Coast Guard, an honest and highly efficient officer of the Government, charged with preventing the smuggling of intoxicating liquor on the seas into this country, declared that he was not able effectively to prevent the smuggling of liquors on the Atlantic coast, and that, as a matter of fact, he was not doing anything upon the Pacific coast. He said he was not able to do so because he did not have sufficient boats and a sufficient force at his command. And that is not all. The Secretary of the Treasury wrote a letter on January 21, 1929, which was widely published over the country. The Secretary of the Treasury for eight years has been at the head of that department charged with the enforcement of this law, and, if rumor is true, is going to be at the head of it for the next four years. He said among other things in this letter:

> As I pointed out in my letter of January 12 to Senator WARREN, prohibition enforcement does not rest solely upon the Bureau of Prohibition but its success depends largely on the cooperation afforded by the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, and the border patrol, and, what is even of more vital importance, on the possibility of bringing to trial cases prepared by the Prohibition Bureau and ready for trial. What I endeavored to point out in my letter to Senator WARREN is that the Harris amendment makes the additional funds available to the Prohibition Bureau only and restricts the uses by that bureau with no discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury. There are now 21,000 liquor cases pending in the Federal courts and causing congestion, with no relief in sight. The Customs Service needs additional guards in the principal ports and the border patrol needs strengthening, while in so far as the Coast Guard is concerned, Admiral Billard is at present undertaking a survey as to the ships needed to replace a number of destroyers whose usefulness has been pretty nearly exhausted, and is prepared to recommend an increase in the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard. The Harris amendment would not make funds available for any of these purposes, nor could the additional money provided for be used for the educational purposes which you emphasize in your telegram.

Thereupon in order to meet the objections of the Secretary of the Treasury the Senator from Georgia changed his amendment so as to place this fund in the hands of the President himself, who is at the head of all the departments, with full power to allocate all or any part of it to any department or bureau charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act. It was passed by the Senate in that form, and that is the amendment which is pending before the House at this time. In the face of these plain admissions how are you Republicans going to justify your refusal to put this sum at the disposal of Mr. Hoover, whom you supported last November?

If he needs this sum to enforce the law and make good his pledges to the people, then he should have it, and as a Democrat I am willing to vote it. If he does not need it, he will not have to expend it; and I, for one, am willing to trust him, whatever may be your opinion of him. And yet distinguished gentlemen like the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who are dry, who have always heretofore earnestly advocated the enforcement of this law, ask Congress, in the face of these statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, Admiral Billard, and Doctor Doran, who are charged with the enforcement of this law to wait six or eight months, or possibly a year and a half, in order that a survey may be made.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Would the passage of this $24,000,000 amendment permit Admiral Billard to increase the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard?

Mr. BYRNS. Undoubtedly it would, because this amendment provides that the $24,000,000 shall not be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury but in the hands of the President himself, with power to allocate it to any department where he may think it is necessary.

Mr. TEMPLE. Could that be done without legislation?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; so far as the border patrol and the Coast Guard are concerned. I regret that I have not the time to yield further. Let me say this to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and also to the gentleman from Michigan, who said that this amendment as passed by the Senate would not permit the money to be used anywhere except by the Prohibition Bureau in the Treasury Department. I differ with these gentlemen, because, as I have stated, it provides that it shall be placed in the hands of the President, who will be Mr. Hoover after March 4, with power to allocate it to any department over which he has charge.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. In a moment. In order to satisfy the gentleman from Michigan I want to tell him and those who profess to be in favor of the enforcement of this law that if he will join those who are seeking to give the President of the United States the money which he needs to carry out the promises made to the people and if he will help to vote down the motion for the previous question on this rule, he will have an opportunity to vote for an amendment which I will offer if I can secure recognition and which will remove every element of doubt which may exist in the mind of the gentleman as to the power of the President to use this appropriation in any department where he may think it is needed. The amendment I propose to offer reads as follows:

> For the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, the national prohibition act and supplemental acts, the tariff acts, and all laws pertaining to the traffic in intoxicating liquors and narcotics, the sum of $24,000,000 or such portion thereof as the President may deem useful, to be expended in the discretion of the President through the Department of Justice, Coast Guard, Customs Bureau, Prohibition Bureau; and he may allot a sufficient sum or amount to the Civil Service Commission for the examination and investigation of eligibles for employment in the enforcement of such laws in the various agencies above mentioned, in accordance with existing law, and to remain available until June 30, 1930.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I can not. Certainly that will satisfy the objection which the gentleman from Michigan raises to the amendment adopted by the Senate and I appeal to him to help vote down the motion for the previous question so that there may be an opportunity to offer it.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. In a moment. The gentleman did not yield when he was on the floor, and I greatly regret that I have not time.

Certainly that will satisfy the objection raised by the gentleman from Michigan with reference to the power of the President of the United States to allocate this fund to those agencies which have charge of the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and the prohibition laws passed thereunder.

Why, my distinguished friend, for whom I have a high regard—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE]—says we have no estimate. For eight years this condition of non law enforcement has continued. The excuse is now given that there has not been sufficient money provided to enforce this law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman three minutes. That is all I can yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS. For eight years they have not had sufficient money, according to Admiral Billard and Mr. Doran, and yet year after year the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have come to Congress asking for the same amount they had the year before. How are you, whether you are wet or dry, but who believe in the enforcement of the law—how are you going to vote the money which they say is required if you are to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], and wait until an estimate is submitted? [Applause.] We who are charged with some responsibility in this matter can not hide behind such a suggestion as that, when the facts are before us. In view of these facts, why has not the Secretary of the Treasury and the President asked for more funds?

This is not unusual. Congress appropriates $10,000,000 to be used as a defense fund by the Shipping Board in the discretion of the President; Congress appropriates $58,000,000 for rivers and harbors, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and in the last analysis by the President of the United States; Congress authorized an appropriation of $325,000,000 for flood control, which is to be expended by the Chief of Engineers under the authority and direction of the President of the United States; Congress places $200,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury for public buildings without power to say where it shall be expended. Why, then, can we not put $24,000,000 in the hands of the President for the better enforcement of the Volstead law if he needs it? Is there anything so peculiar about this appropriation as to distinguish it from these other appropriations, which these gentlemen, now so strenuously objecting because there are no requests or estimates, supported without question? The appropriation carried in this bill for the Prohibition Unit is $13,000,000.

True, we had a statement before the Committee on Appropriations as to how they expected to spend it. But we all know they are not bound by that statement. This is simply giving this power to the President of the United States. We Democrats who voted for another candidate last year are willing to trust him, and I want to ask you Republicans on this side of the Chamber why are you unwilling to trust him with the expenditure of this money in such manner as he may think wise? If he does not need it, I have confidence enough in him, and you should have confidence enough in him, to know that he will not spend it; but if you do not pass it now and wait for a survey there will be no appropriation until the next annual bill, and that bill will not go into effect until July 1, 1930. It is already known, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, that something is needed for the Coast Guard and the border patrol, and it should not take 48 hours to determine what amount is needed. If you favor the enforcement of this law, why wait until July, 1930, to meet the positive needs of the present hour?

Let us vote this appropriation for the President in the interest of the enforcement of this law which is on the statute books. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON]. [Applause.]

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Speaker, the remarks just made by the gentleman from Tennessee afford ample confirmation of the claim made at the start of this debate that politics rather than law enforcement was the moving spirit behind this $24,000,000 provision. The approval with which the gentleman's plea was received on my right clearly indicates the popularity of the cause of political rehabilitation of certain Democratic leaders in Tennessee, Oklahoma, Texas, North Carolina, Virginia, and Florida. I might also add, in view of the very close results last election, in both Georgia and Alabama.

Mr. GREEN. What about Massachusetts and Rhode Island?

Mr. NEWTON. In any event, on the exchange we got more electoral votes than we lost.

Mr. GREEN. And more than you will ever get again.

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; if we follow your lead and play your game, which we are not going to do.

Mr. Speaker, just what is the situation? Here it is in brief: When we convened in December the estimates were received from the Treasury Department, including the prohibition service for prohibition enforcement. These estimates went to the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is a very distinguished member. That committee reported to the House. There was no substantial change in the estimates for prohibition enforcement. The bill was debated and considered; possibly there was the usual talk against prohibition from some of our New York City colleagues. The bill passed without any request from the gentleman from Tennessee that it be increased to the extent of $24,000,000. If there had been need of this additional amount, certainly we would then have heard from the gentleman from Tennessee.

This bill then went over to the other end of the Capitol, where without debate $250,000,000 was added for prohibition enforcement. As I recall it, this was stricken out in conference.

Shortly after the first of the year, the urgent deficiency bill, this measure, was considered in the House. So far as I can recall, there was no suggestion on the part of anyone of adding $24,000,000 to enforce the prohibition laws. It went over to the other end of the Capitol, where, on the floor of that body, an amendment was offered and agreed to appropriating $24,000,000 more for "increasing the enforcement force." In the meantime there had been no request on the part of the Executive branch of the Government for more money, neither had there been any additional estimates furnished. Twenty-four million dollars is a large sum of money. The universal practice is for Congress not to appropriate even a small sum of money unless the need therefor is substantiated by appropriate estimates or detailed requests from responsible administrative officials. How often has the gentleman from Tennessee admonished us to stand by the Budget and to wait for departmental estimates even upon amendments involving $100,000? Twenty-nine other amendments were put on this measure at the other end of the Capitol, further substantially increasing the amount appropriated by this deficiency bill.

Under those circumstances, the universal practice in this House is to go to conference where each and every item that was changed in the other body can be thoroughly discussed and either eliminated or agreed to, with a recommendation to that effect to both House and Senate. It is almost the universal practice to do so. The gentleman in charge of this bill endeavored to do so day before yesterday. If there is any need of this appropriation, surely it would not be jeopardized in the usual conference between House and Senate. This course of procedure was deliberately stopped and prevented by objection from the minority. It, therefore, became necessary for us to ask the Rules Committee to bring in a rule which would permit this bill with the Senate amendments to go to the conference which the Senate has requested.

In brief, that is the situation. Why then so much debate about a proposition so obvious? The answer is not in a desire for prohibition enforcement, but to politically rehabilitate the fast-fading fortunes of the Democratic Party and some of its leaders in the South, and that, Mr. Speaker, is the reason and the only reason. The political fortunes of some of these leaders of the minority, because of the position they took before the action of the convention at Houston, and possibly later, are in a bad way. They need immediate relief.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON. I am sorry I can not, because the gentleman from Texas needs no rehabilitation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. When the gentleman speaks of rehabilitation in Texas, who needs rehabilitation in Texas? There are 18 Democratic Congressmen who came here from that State with the usual Democratic majorities. That being so, who needs rehabilitation down there?

Mr. NEWTON. The party which carried the electoral vote and its leaders in the gentleman's State, and in these other States, needs no rehabilitation.

Furthermore, if there was a real earnest desire to appropriate this money for the enforcement of the prohibition laws, it would have been drawn so as to make the money available for each and every one of the various agencies of the Government that are engaged in the work of prohibition-law enforcement. As it is drawn it can be used by the Prohibition Bureau to increase its present force. However, as I read it, it could not be used by the United States Coast Guard for increasing its ships, nor for adding to its personnel, yet the Coast Guard is one of our most important agencies in enforcing the laws of the land. This is likewise true of the Department of Justice and the Customs Service. All of this indicates haste and lack of consideration of real enforcement. In addition, it lends further confirmation of what has been claimed is the main purpose of this amendment—that is, political rehabilitation of the minority and certain of its leaders in the South. Some of these leaders advocated nominating a man as their candidate for President long before the convention was called to order at Houston. They knew that this leader who was later nominated was wet. They knew that he was against the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, and that he had personally advocated and secured a repeal of all prohibition enforcement laws in New York State. Governor Smith was nominated. Immediately thereafter he personally repudiated the dry platform upon which he was nominated. This was followed by the appointment of a national chairman, Mr. Raskob, who likewise was militantly wet, opposed to the eighteenth amendment and the enforcement act, and who likewise repudiated his party's stand on this question.

Mr. Speaker, this sort of leadership was naturally repudiated. There is a fear that if something is not done some of these leaders who were responsible for this will likewise be repudiated in the next two or four years. How can that be prevented, is the question that has been troubling them. How can these fading political fortunes be rehabilitated? How Raskob was called to rehabilitate financially during the campaign. Apparently these leaders now demand that the aid of the Treasury and the cause of prohibition be enlisted to rehabilitate them.

Almost four-fifths of the votes for this amendment over in another body came from the minority party.

Gentlemen, there are those of us here who have a consistent record in support of the eighteenth amendment and the enforcement act. Personally, if those charged with the responsibility of enforcing the laws of the land need more money and will give me some idea as to how it is to be spent, I stand ready to vote any reasonable additional sum. If after the 4th of March the new President feels that he should have additional moneys for this purpose and will so advise us, I stand ready to vote any reasonable additional appropriation. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not willing, under the guise of law enforcement, to appropriate $24,000,000 or any part thereof for the purpose of rehabilitating the political fortunes of any man. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, let there be no misunderstanding here this afternoon. Gentlemen of the House, the people of the United States selected by a great vote and a great majority a distinguished citizen to be President. Now, the prohibition forces of the United States come up in an orderly, decent way and ask that in addition to the $35,000,000 that is carried in the bill, that $24,000,000 be placed in the hands of this new President of the United States to use as the exigencies or the emergencies may demand throughout the next fiscal year for the purpose of enforcing the prohibition law of this Republic.

All this Dolly Varden argument that is made here against it fools no one. [Laughter.]

These gentlemen that have been traveling all these years under the cloak of prohibition raiment, appearing this afternoon as false prophets in sheep's clothing, are ravening wolves and are against the very forces that put your party in power for the next four years.

You understand, gentlemen, that this talk about the people of the United States who happened to support the Democratic nominee for President does not appease the wrath of an outraged public. You are the people who are responsible for the enforcement of this law and the attempted ridicule that you place upon distinguished gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House, impugns their motives, and one distinguished gentleman, for whom I have the utmost respect, even said it was political business, when on your side I heard an able, distinguished, higher-college man, a minister of the Gospel, stand right here in this wellhole and say he would not vote for this additional $24,000,000 to enforce this law. With that in your mouths, with that going into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as publicity to be carried throughout this country from one end of the Republic to the other, is it possible that you can get away with such knavery? [Laughter and applause.]

This is an honest Congress. This amendment is put up here with honest intention. Can you stand before the American people and say that you are afraid to place $24,000,000 in the hands of the President of the United States to enforce the prohibition law?

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I have not time to yield.

You know you are not fooling yourselves and you do not fool a man on this side of the House; and I trust that none of your constituencies is so ignorant as to be fooled by such statements and such arguments as have passed the lips of gentlemen here this afternoon.

Men, it is time to have some good faith. If you are a prohibitionist, stand up with your votes and say so. Do not be double-crossing around in an endeavor to fool anybody. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] said he is going to vote with the prohibitionists here, but that his motives were not in accord with the motives of the prohibitionists. He goes out and says that he wants to tear the law down by putting up this $24,000,000. He goes out and attacks the Anti-Saloon League. There may be some errors made by the Anti-Saloon League, but we know they are engaged in a great moral work. We know the purpose of the Anti-Saloon League and of all the people who are endeavoring to do away with the liquor traffic in the United States. We know they are engaged in a most holy cause; and as one man representing an honest constituency, I am going to vote for every dollar of money that is necessary to carry out the eighteenth amendment and the enabling act passed thereunder.

We can not afford to pussyfoot around and endeavor to fool somebody. We have just had a great campaign in this country, where all the Republicans enticed and seduced a great many good, honest Democrats to go and vote for a Republican for President on the ground that he is a prohibitionist and is going to enforce the prohibition law. [Applause.]

That distinguished gentleman has declared that prohibition is a noble experiment. Then, put this $24,000,000 in his hands and let him carry this experiment on to a successful conclusion. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I give three minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY].

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, day before yesterday, when this matter first came up in the House, I received from my State the following telegram:

> The Christian Civic League, representing the churches of Maine, asks your support for bill for larger prohibition-enforcement appropriation.
> FREDERICK W. SMITH.

I replied as follows:

> MY DEAR SIR: I duly received your telegram of yesterday and note the churches of Maine, through the Christian Civic League, urge me to vote for the Harris amendment to the appropriation bill for greater prohibition enforcement, etc.
> I fear the churches of my State do not fully understand the legislative situation relative to this amendment. To vote for an appropriation of millions of dollars of the people's money for any purpose against the recommendation of the Bureau of the Budget, the Treasury Department, and the President is, to my mind, wholly unsound and not in accordance with the idea creating the Bureau of the Budget. Beneath this there is also a lot of politics, and I do not propose in the few days before I am to retire from Congress to play into the hands of friends of the liquor traffic under such a guise. I regret I can not support your request.

Forty years in town, county, State, State legislature, and Congress I have given my support to prohibition—to the eighteenth amendment and to the laws passed for its enforcement. I have stood for national prohibition and its enforcement against the unlawful liquor traffic, and I have during all these years had just one rule—find out where the unlawful liquor traffic stands and then vote and work for the opposite. [Applause.]

The present $24,000,000 item is put on by a combination of wets and drys, the wets united and the drys divided.

We have a strange situation in this House in the discussion of this rule. The time has come when "the lion and the lamb shall lie down together." The wet roaring lion, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], is lying down with the dry, innocent lamb, Doctor McBride, of the Anti-Saloon League. My observation has been that when at the close of a perfect day the lion and the lamb lie down together, in the morning the lamb turns up missing. [Laughter and applause.]

The day that Pilate and Herod became friends Christ was crucified. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I am in somewhat of a peculiar position. I am ranked here as a "wringing wet," so to speak, and listening to the gentleman from Maine, who just preceded me, he wants to know how the wets are going to vote, and then he knows that he ought to vote on the other side.

I have prepared a statement which I want to read into the RECORD. I am going to vote against the amendment, but I am not doing it for the same reason as are the wets and drys. I am voting against the amendment because my stand from the beginning in this House has been that I want to dispose of the criminals in the Prohibition Department. I am opposed to the Federal Government protecting the criminal agents against the wishes of the State. [Applause.]

The question of permitting the Prohibition Department to have an additional $24,000,000, about one-twelfth of the amount claimed by the administrator necessary to enforce the law, has somewhat divided the wets and the drys of this House. Some of the drys contend that the money is not sufficient and against the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, who claims that it is not necessary at this time. Some of the wets are supporting it because they feel that the Government should make an honest effort to enforce the law. However, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to vote against this amendment because of the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, nor am I voting against it because I do not want to see an honest effort made to enforce the law, but I intend to vote against this measure because the Federal Government and the Members of this House have positively refused to get rid of the criminals in the Prohibition Department, and for the further reason that when a prohibition agent is indicted by a local grand jury, whether it is for a misdemeanor or a felony, they not only refuse to suspend that agent pending the trial but they place no faith in the State judiciary by permitting the agent to be tried before the State tribunal, but invariably the district attorney files a petition to have the case transferred to the Federal court and there lets it die without a trial. When the Government makes an effort to dispose of the criminals and suspends agents who have been indicted for alleged crimes, I will then vote to permit the Government a fair trial in enforcing this law, but that I know the Government can not do because the sentiment is against them, and you can not enforce any law that the people themselves do not sanction.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the attitude of some of the gentlemen who are in favor of this rule, and who are opposed to the proposed $24,000,000 appropriation, makes it somewhat difficult for me to vote as I am going to vote, notwithstanding their attitude.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] taunts the Democratic Party with the jokes of the greatest humorist of America, and says that my party ought to follow the humorist's suggestion and take a million and one-half dollars from this proposed appropriation and pay the deficit in its campaign expenditures.

I reply and inform the gentleman that the Democratic Party will never follow the practices of the Republican Party, to which he belongs, and pay its deficiencies as his party has done. [Applause.]

The Democratic Party has never been, and I am quite sure will never be, in a position or have the disposition to follow the course of the gentleman's party in that behalf. The Democratic Party has no Teapot Dome, no Fall, no Daugherty, no Sinclair, no Will Hays. [Applause.]

The gentleman is also far off the course when he claims that the recent election was a test between the "drys" and the "wets." If that were true, how does he explain the great vote by which the proposed prohibition laws submitted to the voters of Montana at the recent election was defeated and the majority given Mr. Hoover in the same State at the same election?

But I am almost amused by these earnest souls that never see any good in any party except their own or that with which they are associated. An example was furnished in the late election by the action of those who were choked and nauseated by the local stench that came from the corruption of Tammany a half a century ago, and then turned with open mouths and extended nostrils and drank in and seemingly enjoyed the awful national stench emanating from the cesspool of corruption made by members of the Republican Party in high office.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] stand on the floor of this House, with others, and boast of their dryness and of their loyalty to the prohibition cause, and charge that Members on this side of the House who oppose the appropriation are actuated in that behalf by their desire to rehabilitate the Democratic Party, and otherwise impugn their good faith; and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] charges that the wets and the drys stand united in favor of this proposed appropriation, and are doing so because of the desire of the former to discredit prohibition and of the latter to handicap the President elect. Such attacks and attitude are almost sufficient to cause any Democrat or a so-called wet to subordinate his own judgment as to the merits of the matter in question and vote in favor of the appropriation. However, I shall not do so. On the contrary, I shall perform my duty as I think becomes a Congressman. I am classed as a wet, and my best judgment is that this appropriation should not be made, and I am going to vote against it. [Applause.]

I am going to vote against it not for the reasons assigned by the gentlemen from Minnesota and Michigan and some others that oppose the appropriation. I shall vote against the item because, in my judgment, the prohibition law can not be enforced, and I do not propose to assist in making a useless expenditure of the taxpayers' money.

I am not actuated in this behalf by the promises of the gentleman from Michigan that the incoming administration will be any more efficient in the enforcement of the prohibition law than the present administration.

In fact, I am reminded by the assurances of the gentleman of the many past promises of his party. It promised time after time, for eight long years, while in full control of every department of the Government, that it would provide farm relief, in answer to the continuous demand for the same; and upon such unfulfilled promises won every intervening election. This was inevitable for the simple reason that the farmers and the northern elements of the Anti-Saloon League are always Republicans before they are economists or prohibitionists.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE of Colorado. I regret to decline, but I have only a few minutes.

Now, what is the situation here? We have a rule which the majority are seeking to force through this House, and what do they say? Why, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] claims and asserts, in substance, that the country is standing on the eve of a dry administration, lead by Mr. Hoover, President elect, and that the wet and dry Democrats are seeking to handicap Mr. Hoover in that behalf and discredit his administration.

Does the gentleman mean to cast reflection upon the good faith of the present Republican administration? Does he imply or charge or claim that the present administration, with its many enforcement agents and its thousands of officeholders, has been and is hypocritical and not honestly in favor of the enforcement of the prohibition laws?

His party has been in power continuously since March 4, 1921, and I am informed, through personal investigation and otherwise, that substantially every prohibition enforcement agent and director has been appointed at the behest of the Anti-Saloon League or some of its associated organizations.

Is it not obvious that if prohibition is enforceable the Republican Party has not been honest in its pretentions and promises, or the country would now be dry? That party has followed the leadership and submitted to the domination of the Anti-Saloon League for many years past. It has permitted that organization to select agents of its own choosing to enforce this law, and along with that organization it now admits egregious failure of the whole thing and comes before this House to-day with new promises.

But what else do they do? They came to this Congress and asked that the prohibition-enforcement agents be placed under civil service and urged that if this were done prohibition could be successfully enforced. The Congress complied with the request, and then what happened? Immediately there came a great protest from the Anti-Saloon League and its associated organizations that the prohibition agents who had failed to pass the civil-service examination be not discharged, but continued in the service. Moreover, when the Civil Service Commission adhered to its findings the President of the United States, by Executive order, complied with the demands of the Anti-Saloon League and reinstated most all of those that had failed to pass the examination.

I can not characterize this action of the Anti-Saloon League other than a camouflage. In my judgment, there may be one way in which prohibition might be enforced, and that is to kill everyone who violates that law. And in that case, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that on both sides of the dividing aisle of this Chamber there would be an awful lonesomeness.

However, even Mr. Hoover is not certain in regard to what can or may be done in the enforcement of this law. He has never said that he approves the prohibition law. He has declared that he is in favor of the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, and every other right-thinking person is in favor of doing the same thing as long as it is a part of the Constitution. He has never even said that prohibition is a noble experiment. On the contrary, he simply said that "prohibition is an experiment, noble in purpose," and that a correct solution of its enforcement could only be ascertained after a thorough investigation and survey of the whole subject. Our Republican friends, both wet and dry, seized upon this statement and played it up 100 per cent during the late campaign.

They manifested, however, quite a different attitude when, on the 21st of last May, I introduced in this House a resolution to appoint a committee to make a broad and thorough investigation and survey of the entire subject of prohibition and its enforcement, or the modification thereof. But these gentlemen that are now so ardent in their desire to "let Mr. Hoover do it" remained silent and my resolution got no further than the Committee on Rules.

However, my own view is that a survey, by whomsoever made or initiated, will avail little, if anything, for the simple reason that it is based on a misconception of human nature. You cannot enforce any criminal law successfully unless the crime facts, the things which constitute the crime, embody in themselves an element of evil to such an extent that it automatically shocks the conscience of most people. [Applause.]

There is no such element of evil in the facts of crimes created by the Volstead Act. In such crimes as murder, robbery, burglary, arson, rape, theft, embezzlement, and like crimes, there is an element of inherent evil in the crime facts that shocks the conscience of most everyone, and renders the laws creating such crimes enforceable. The result is that most all people respect those laws in which there is an inherent evil in the crime facts, and exert themselves to see that such laws are obeyed and enforced. But this is not so with the crimes under the Volstead Act.

Should you see a burglar attempting to enter your neighbor's house you would, however indisposed or sleepy, immediately give the alarm. But should you happen to glance in your neighbor's home and see him preparing a highball, or other intoxicating drink, what you would do is perhaps conjectural, but it is safe to assert that you would not exert yourself in preventing its preparation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, answering my friend, the major, I would rather dance with the bootlegger than be the cream in Bishop Cannon's coffee. Moreover, if I do dance, I do not intend to dance the Virginia reel. I want to congratulate my friends Mr. CRAMTON and Mr. COOPER of Ohio on the recovery of their God-given conscience from the Anti-Saloon League. It was worth $24,000,000 of the Government's money to hear the speeches of those two gentlemen here to-day.

Washington is confronted by the unholy spectacle of the racketeers of reform trying to browbeat the Congress into dissipating $24,000,000 of the public funds on prohibition.

Over the heads of legislators they are holding the threat of church opposition in the primaries. They want to separate not church and state, but they want to separate millions from the State for propagation of prohibition bigotry.

Such is their impatience that they can not wait until March 4 to claim their share of the loot of victory. They tasted blood on last election day and they must now poke their snouts into the Treasury. The whirlwind of the Lord is under way and going into high.

The ghostly commander of the fanatics, Bishop Cannon, has been flitting in and out of the District giving his commands. He has been of low visibility.

What they lost in brains when Wheeler died they gained in impertinence under McBride. He has issued written orders to Congress under penalty of political death warrant in case they are not obeyed and without benefit of clergy.

Congress should not only refuse the appropriation but should pass legislation to exterminate the plague of prohibition pests. It should not be called an appropriation, but an embezzlement featured by political hi-jacking.

The Government has been challenged by the church—the prohibition creed opposes itself to the rest of the Constitution and orderly government. The uncanny shadow of Bishop Cannon, with its sinister implication of a church-controlled Government, is across the Capitol. I trust that the shadow will be forever removed and that clear thinking will take the place of moral epilepsy in America.

I believe that Secretary Mellon owes it to the country to state whether or not prohibition can be enforced. All the money in the Treasury is not more powerful than the will and appetite of the American people.

Congress will lose more power by passing this discretionary appropriation. The legislative branch of Government is fading. The best proof of that is found in the scandals of the executive and judicial branches. We are becoming powerless and pure.

Ex-Sheriff Foley, of New York, once said that there were two classes of men—A, the fellow who digs a hole for his neighbor to fall in, and B, the samaritan, who pulls his neighbor out of the hole. To-day we must add a third and more altruistic class—the Democratic intelligentsia, who dig a hole for Andy Mellon to fall in and then fall in it themselves so that he may climb over their dead bodies to greater heights. Now when Cabinet appointments are problematical our Democratic leadership have responded nobly to the cartoonist's philosophy—"When a feller needs a friend."

I am glad that Republicans have taken a run-out powder on the fanatics. I congratulate the G. O. P. elephant on not being terrified by the mice of prohibition.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the Harris amendment and will vote for it if I have an opportunity.

The incoming President, Mr. Hoover, said during the recent campaign that if he was elected that he would undertake to enforce the prohibition law. All agree that it has not been enforced, the chief excuse given was the want of sufficient money for this purpose. I am in favor of placing this large amount in the hands of the President, with the power and discretion to use it in such way as he thinks will accomplish the most good, so that it can not be claimed hereafter nonenforcement of this law is due to the want of sufficient funds. Let us do our duty, furnish the necessary money and put the responsibility for enforcement where it properly belongs. I will vote against the motion for the previous question, so that we can have a direct vote on the Harris amendment. The motion for the previous question is intended to deprive us of that right and privilege. I will also vote against the pending rule. We need no request from the Bureau of the Budget for this increase of appropriation for prohibition enforcement. If it should be more than is needed the President would not be required to spend it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, some years ago I was stopping in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., a place well known to thousands of people of this country. Mrs. Linthicum and I attended the Episcopal Church one Sunday evening in that city. The pastor, the Rev. Joseph Cary, announced that after the services he would conduct another service for the colored people, so that the waiters and maids of the hotels and the colored residents of the city might attend. I noticed during the services a man in the seat in front of me, who had gone to sleep, apparently very soundly asleep. He did not hear what was going on. After the white service was over we concluded we would remain for the colored service, especially so because I have always enjoyed the musical singing of the colored people in my southern Maryland home. The man in front was still sound asleep when the white congregation passed out and the colored congregation came in. They were seated in the same pew with this man, in front of him, all about him. The church was crowded with colored people, and when the man awoke he looked at those beside him, those in front of him, to the right and to the left, and quietly taking up his hat sneaked out of the church, a most astonished man, who had gone to sleep among the white folks and had awakened among the colored folks. [Applause.]

When I think of my position, having all these drys on the Republican side, including that stalwart leader, Mr. CRAMTON, the gentleman from Michigan; that hero of prohibition from Michigan, Mr. HUDSON; the staunch prohibitionist from Ohio, Mr. COOPER; and all their friends who have heretofore advocated everything in favor of prohibition, when I see them voting with me and with my friends of the "antiprohibition committee," I am not less astonished than was the man in Doctor Cary's church.

This amendment introduced by Senator HARRIS to the first deficiency bill and adopted by the Senate, proposes to give to the President the vast sum of $24,000,000—to be distributed by him for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. In the first place, this is a great sum to give to any one official to be disposed of in this manner. If I believed that this sum could be used to advantage, I should not object to it, because it would merely demonstrate that prohibition can not be enforced. I know so long as a grain of wheat or a grain of corn properly treated will, according to the laws of nature, produce alcohol, that prohibition can not be enforced. Not alone have we humanity to contend with, but we have the laws of nature and the frailty of mankind.

We learn from the Prohibition Unit that 75 per cent of their employees who took the civil-service examination were unable to pass the efficiency test; and now to-day, much to my surprise, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] tells us that not over 6 per cent of the men in the Prohibition Unit are under civil service. That graft, bribery, and corruption exist in the prohibition enforcement personnel is a matter of official declaration. It was Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman, who is quoted as saying:

> There are many incompetent and crooked men in the service; bribery is rampant; there are many men in sheep's clothing; some days my arm gets tired signing orders dismissing crooks and incompetents.

The Prohibition Unit has even gone so far as to poison alcohol to prevent its use as a beverage, and yet arrests for drunkenness increase, the whole country is permeated with liquor, and conditions are far worse than they were under the old system. I should like to vote for $24,000,000, a part to be used for the establishment of a system similar to that in the Province of Quebec, Dominion of Canada. I should like to see light wines and beer permitted, not to be drunk on the premises. I think it is generally conceded that none of us want the old saloon back.

If you will adopt the system I suggest, I verily believe that drinking of intoxicants will become largely a thing of the past. I should like to see a part of the money used in the education of the youth of the land, and of the adults as well, showing to them the effects of alcohol and the effects of drinking generally. Education had almost eradicated it before the eighteenth amendment was adopted.

I have not to my knowledge ever voted against an appropriation asked for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, a part of our Constitution, the prohibition act, even though I knew it was money wasted; but I can not vote for $24,000,000 which is not asked for by the Treasury Department, nor recommended by the President, and which I know if used will merely place more snoopers, snipers, and smellers in the prohibition-enforcement service to the detriment of the comfort and happiness of the people and a waste of the taxpayers' money. Some feel that Uncle Sam is very rich, that his resources can not be impaired, but let me ask you to keep in mind always the fact that the Treasury of the United States has only in its coffers money taken from the people as taxation, that every dollar wasted by such useless appropriations simply means more for the taxpayers to contribute.

Let me further remind you that everybody in this Nation is a taxpayer, either through the high protective tariff which the Republican Party has placed upon us, through the income tax, or through some indirect manner in which everybody must contribute to the support of the Government. It would mean simply $24,000,000 poured down a rat hole which can not be filled. [Applause.]

When we realize the vast sums already being expended for enforcement it is astounding. Observe these expenditures for 1926–27 which are still mounting, and ask yourself should not more have been achieved, to wit:

1926–27 appropriation for Coast Guard, $24,213,140, of which amount there was included for prohibition	$14,560,011
Treasury Department for enforcement of prohibition	10,635,685
Department of Justice, according to Mr. Harris, one-third of the total appropriation used for prohibition	8,000,000
Total	33,195,696
Investment for prohibition enforcement:
1925–26 appropriation for new vessels and repairs for Coast Guard	19,194,900
1926–27 additional for repairs and ships	3,900,000
Taken over from the Navy 25 torpedo boats, which cost the Government $1,500,000 each	37,500,000
Total	53,594,900

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY].

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the House granting this additional $24,000,000 appropriation for prohibition enforcement. The Senate should have been satisfied with the large sum for prohibition already passed by the House and included in this deficiency bill when it was sent to the Senate some weeks ago. The Treasury Department is opposed to this $24,000,000 appropriation and until they were whipped into line by methods peculiar to the Anti-Saloon League some of the leading Anti-Saloon League officials were opposed to the $24,000,000.

A few days ago, and to-day also, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who not only admits, but proudly declares from time to time that he is opposed to the eighteenth amendment, graciously advised the House that he is in favor of giving the prohibitionists this $24,000,000, and also offers gratuitous and detailed advice that much of it could be spent to good advantage in Detroit. If the case for this reckless expenditure of $24,000,000 of the people's money depends upon the Detroit situation, then the taxpayers can be saved this amount or it can be spent for purposes which are more fitting for the general welfare.

PROHIBITION AGENTS UNDESIRABLE

No fair or reasonable man, after a careful study of prohibition enforcement in Detroit by Federal agents would say that it has been a success, or that it has promoted the general welfare. He would also be compelled to admit that the more prohibition agents sent to Detroit the worse conditions became.

The peculiar iniquity of this amendment is its chief aim to produce additional hordes of prohibition agents. The Treasury Department through Secretary Mellon issued an official statement to that effect yesterday.

Six days ago in Detroit the trial opened in the Federal court of 23 prohibition agents charged with graft, corruption, and extortion, running into millions of dollars. Only within the very recent past the superintendent in charge of the Detroit River prohibition agents summarily quit his job and left for the East. For reasons best known to themselves and which are as yet a mystery to Detroit, 12 of his agents quit with him.

THE BLACK SHEEP OF THE AGENTS

For many months before the trap was sprung on the Detroit prohibition agents it was an open and notorious fact in the Detroit district that informed persons were freely declaring that there was only one honest, zealous prohibition agent in the Detroit border force.

At that time and before wholesale arrests and resignations threw slaughter into their ranks, there were scores of prohibition agents in the Detroit district.

After United States Secret Service men were imported into Detroit from Washington and wholesale arrests of prohibition agents followed, widespread publicity was given to the testimony that out of all the army of prohibition-enforcement agents in the Detroit district there was "only one honest, zealous man" and that he had been forced by hostility of prohibition agents and of beer and liquor-running agencies to quit the Federal prohibition squad and take refuge in the Detroit police force, walking a beat.

PROHIBITION KILLS TEMPERANCE

Before the Anti-Saloon League got busy and put over the eighteenth amendment in 1918, Detroit was rapidly becoming a temperance city. We had about 1,907 saloons in 1918. They were well regulated; none of them were open after 10 o'clock in the evening and none of them were within 400 feet of a church, school, or first-class residence section. Now, the intemperance of the eighteenth amendment has produced over 20,000 saloons; they are not regulated at all, most of them stay open until 2 o'clock in the morning, and some stay open all night. They are sometimes found in close proximity to churches and schools, and they spring up in the finest of our residential sections.

That the growth of intemperance and lawlessness and unregulated saloons under the eighteenth amendment is not peculiar to Detroit, but extends to practically all cities in the United States, is a fact quite easily proved. Prohibition Commissioner James M. Doran admitted just the other day that there are "only about 3,000 bootleggers in Washington now." This is right under the nose of Doctor Doran and his Prohibition Bureau and of a House and Senate preponderantly dry. Just before the Volstead Act went into effect there were 300 saloons in Washington, well regulated and disciplined and limited by law to 300 in number. Now we have 3,000 two-legged traveling saloons in the persons of the ever-present enterprising bootleggers.

MESSRS. HOLSAPLE AND KRESGE

Some of the leading lights of the Anti-Saloon League live in Detroit. One of our respected citizens is now president of the Anti-Saloon League of the United States. We have also as State superintendent of the Michigan Anti-Saloon League former Rev. R. N. Holsaple, who is recognized as one of the most extreme prohibition fanatics in the world. It is Mr. Holsaple who has been so lustily "crowing" about the great victory of the prohibitionists in sending to prison for a life term at hard labor the poverty-stricken mother of 10 children only because she violated the eighteenth amendment. What the average good Michigander considers to be Michigan's shame, Mr. Holsaple considers Michigan's crowning glory! Yet, when Mr. Holsaple's own brother-in-law was sent to jail for bootlegging, Mr. Holsaple was accused of using his great influence as head of the Michigan Anti-Saloon League and bringing pressure to bear on the State pardon and parole commissioner to secure leniency for the brother-in-law.

Detroit harbors the "angel" of the Anti-Saloon League, America's driest, most persistent lover, Sebastian S. Kresge, who is still going strong at 60, and who devotes all his spare time when he is not engaged in amours and dalliances, illicit and otherwise, in crying out that the people of Detroit, the people of America and of Europe, and other parts of the world must not be allowed to drink beer, light wines, and other beverages of which he does not approve.

For instance, Mr. Kresge thinks that 50,000,000 Frenchmen must be wrong in drinking light wines. He is certain that over 70,000,000 Germans lose their value as workers and as scientists in sticking to their beer all these ages, and that 45,000,000 of Englishmen are rapidly degenerating through their devotion to ale and porter.

It was Mr. Kresge who was wildly applauded recently at a prohibition gathering when he said he would give $500,000 to the Anti-Saloon League. Mr. Upshaw, a distinguished former Member of this House, did the proper thing by enthusiastically applauding my fellow townsman, Mr. Kresge, and pointing his finger at him demanded that the audience sing "Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow."

What has been done with Mr. Kresge's $500,000 gift to the Anti-Saloon League? The league has been forced finally to file statements under the law as to its receipts and expenditures and in the 1928 report recently filed with the Clerk of the House, William Tyler Page, the Anti-Saloon League stated it received $86,404.82 and expended $83,863.11. Stanley S. Kresge is listed among the contributors in this statement as giving $10,000 on September 10, 1928, and Stanley is the son of Sebastian S. Kresge, the "angel." Anna S. Kresge, of Michigan, gave $100 on September 10, 1928.

But where and how does the Anti-Saloon League account for the receipt of the $500,000 donation, and what is just as important, how did the league spend this money? I have a personal interest in asking because the Anti-Saloon League has always actively tried to defeat me in primaries and in elections for Congress. I would like to know whether I have had the honor of having a portion of this $500,000 spent against me.

AGENTS BREED CRIME

It is superfluous for the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] to point the finger of suspicion at Detroit and to hustle the Federal prohibition force to that city. Mr. Kresge and other distinguished drys of our State have already performed that service for Detroit and for the country. Prohibition agents have been sent in droves to Detroit.

The more prohibition agents they sent to Detroit, the worse conditions grew. To Detroiters many prohibition agents have been teachers of all sorts of crimes; among these are highjacking, racketeering, grafting, bribery, corruption, slaying of innocent citizens by gunmen methods, drunken driving of automobiles, illegal seizure of motor boats and other water craft, invasion of the neutrality of Canada by wilfully sending armed patrols into Canadian waters for which official apologies were made to Canada, and various other offenses.

It was proved in the recent Philadelphia scandals which are a stench in the nostrils of decent Americans that Gen. Smedley Butler's prohibition squad of selected agents were generally teachers—yes, professors—of crime who corrupted the rest of the police department and practically everyone to whom their influence extended. That has been true in Detroit. This experience in Philadelphia with prohibition agents and raiding squads has been proved over and over again in Detroit.

THE DRYS' REIGN OF TERROR

Probably through the influence of Michigan drys, whose names are a household word in the Nation, about three years ago Detroit was selected for a punitive exhibition by dry terrorists which was to prove an example and a warning to other communities in the United States. Col. A. J. Hanlon, a hard-boiled Army officer, who was to do "whatever should be necessary," was in charge. Another of the officials was Maj. Maurice Campbell, known now as the Broadway night-club raider. They opened the "reign of terror" by instructing their men to "get rough"; to discard the heavy revolvers in use, which were contemptuously called "pea shooters" by Colonel Hanlon, and get extra large revolvers, sawed-off shotguns, and rifles.

The campaign of terrorism was promptly inaugurated by the murder of an old letter carrier, named Neidermeier, who was entirely innocent of any wrongdoing and who had been hunting ducks with a companion on the Detroit River, and was returning in a skiff through a small creek without a drop of liquor in his boat. Two roughly dressed prohibition agents without uniforms hailed him from the bank of the creek as he passed close to it, and when he did not stop, either because he did not hear the hail through noise made by his outboard motor or because he was suspicious of the men on the bank being bandits, they opened fire on him at a distance of but a few yards with a large revolver and high-powered rifle, and while his back was turned, shot him through the back. He lingered in terrible agony for several days and then died. This was not the only act of violence by prohibition agents. There were many more.

I saw Colonel Hanlon and Major Campbell the next morning to get the details of the shooting, and was astounded to find that, while they knew the agents had mortally wounded an honest and harmless old man, a public official in the Federal service with great honor and credit for many years, they expressed no regret nor sympathy, but told me belligerently that more people were going to be killed in Detroit, whether innocent or violating the prohibition law, if they did not halt when yelled at by prohibition agents, even though roughly dressed and without uniforms. Colonel Hanlon said that a state of war existed between Detroit and the prohibition squad and that he was prepared to recognize it as such. Yet no prohibition agent was ever injured in Detroit except by due process of law. I called his attention to the fact that President Coolidge had said in his message to Congress about a month or so before that, happily the United States is at peace, but Colonel Hanlon replied that that did not matter to him.

I called attention to the numerous holdups and prevalence of stick-up men in Detroit largely due to the eighteenth amendment, and that innocent Detroit citizens were justified in running or trying to get away if roughly dressed men without uniforms ordered them to "throw up their hands." This made no impression on the colonel nor the major.

I then told these two that undoubtedly they were guilty as accessories before the fact, in inciting their agents to the murder of the old letter carrier, and that they were accessories after the fact in justifying the murder and in trying to save the two prohibition agents from due process of law.

GUILTY AS ACCESSORIES

I informed Hanlon and Campbell that if another murder of an innocent Detroit man, woman, or child took place that I would take steps to have them arrested as accessories to murder. I also declared that I was sure that our local institutions of self-government and our courts of justice would bring the slayer of old man Neidermeier to trial and to justice.

Although the Anti-Saloon League and the prohibition agents strained every nerve to save Benway, the slayer of Neidermeier, from justice, he was convicted and is now serving his six months in prison.

The prohibition squad sent a special attorney from the Department of Justice to Detroit to aid the local district attorney's office. Seven women were placed on the jury, and the need of rigorously enforcing the eighteenth amendment was argued to the jury; yet Benway was convicted of felonious assault with intent to kill. The penalty was six months to three years, and the judge gave him six months. He appealed to superior Federal courts, but is now serving his time.

I am happy to report that as the result of the cruel and unjustified murder of the old letter carrier by prohibition agents Colonel Hanlon was compelled to withdraw his orders to the prohibition agents to be "rough" and to "shoot quick and to shoot to kill." Instead he was forced by public sentiment to order his men to be extremely careful with their firearms and to shoot only in self-defense and when their own lives were in danger. Not only that, but the immigration officials on the Detroit border were also doing some high, wide, and handsome shooting.

I protested their lawlessness and they were given even more strict orders than the prohibition agents. The outburst of public indignation in Detroit compelled the transfer of Colonel Hanlon to the New Jersey district. Maj. Maurice Campbell was transferred to the New York district. Thus was Detroit given a brief breathing spell from the "reign of terror" through the sacrifice of the old letter carrier's life and other outrages.

GRAFT AND CORRUPTION

However, it was not long before an orgy of graft, corruption, and drunk-driving of automobiles was instituted by Federal prohibition agents foisted upon Detroit. As one indication of the general condition, I may inform the House that a year ago this past Christmas drunken prohibition agents in Detroit injured or wrecked 13 automobiles which they were driving or which they hit during their holiday drinking carnival.

Their graft and corruption on a large scale have occupied a prominent place in Detroit papers for the past several months, and the trial of these 23 prohibition agents who are now in the toils will give Detroiters and, in fact, all Americans further insight into the method of prohibition agents.

If Mr. LAGUARDIA and the sponsors of this wasteful and thoroughly unjustifiable expenditure of $24,000,000 have their way and send more prohibition agents into Detroit, they will further prove and demonstrate the axiom of the past few years: "The more prohibition agents in Detroit the more crime and menace to good government and the ideals of the Republic."

Figures which I have obtained from the Prohibition Bureau show that from January 16, 1920, to November 1, 1928, 177 persons connected with the Prohibition Bureau, excepting narcotic employees, were charged and convicted with drunkenness and disorderly conduct and other nonindictable offenses. The number separated for cause from January 16, 1920, to October 1, 1928, totals 1,291. This does not include the great number of agents in the Detroit district who were recently arrested and are now awaiting trial nor the considerable number who recently quit the service when their associates were arrested. Nor does it include the great number of crooks and near crooks who are still embedded in the prohibition service without charges pending against them. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I do not propose to discuss the merits or demerits of the pending resolution. I had expected to introduce an amendment, if the deficiency bill had come before the House for the purpose of amendments, by adding the words, after "prohibition enforcement," "narcotic enforcement." I believe the House will agree with me very largely that it would be perfectly proper to permit the use of part of the $24,000,000 provided to enforce the prohibition law for the enforcement of the narcotic laws. I do not know how many Members of the House have studied the narcotic situation in America at the present time; but due to the recent murder of Arnold Rothstein, the New York gambler, and his alleged connection with the international drug ring, public sentiment has been aroused and caused a demand to be made upon Congress for increased appropriations to facilitate securing evidence against the big dope rings. From the disclosures made at that time it was proved that in excess of $25,000,000 of illegal narcotics were smuggled within the last year into the port of New York and that the so-called crime wave in Chicago and New York and throughout this country can be directly traced back to the use of these smuggled drugs. One-third of the Federal prisoners are known to be addicts. Fifty per cent of all our crimes can be traced to the use of dope. Colonel Nutt, head of the narcotic bureau, told me that if he had an opportunity to use any substantial amount of Government money to buy information, he could pretty nearly put an end to the smuggling of these drugs. For instance, he said if he had $20,000 to give for information that he could stop 2 tons of morphine from coming into the United States of America, and that no money was to be paid out until the seizure was made. I think the Congress of the United States has a very distinct duty to provide sufficient funds to rigidly enforce the narcotic laws. The Congress provided for no additional appropriation this year in spite of the fact that the smuggling of drugs has become a national scandal. An alarming traffic in illicit drugs exists in the United States to-day and is eating into the lifeblood of the people and even seeping into the public schools. Only recently a trunk containing $2,000,000 worth of drugs was seized by Government officials. Think of the misery and deadly poison contained in that trunk alone! The Congress is not economizing when it stints on appropriations to enforce the narcotic laws. The total appropriation is only $1,411,260, about half of which is returned to the United States Treasury from registration fees and fines. It is the distinct duty of Congress to try to protect the American people from the greed of these smugglers who are to-day bringing all forms of narcotics into the ports of New York, San Francisco, New Orleans, and Florida; and unless Congress appropriates additional funds to enable agents to make large purchases of narcotics and thereby apprehend the big dealers and the higher-ups in the dope rings, why the situation will remain hopeless and their hands will be tied.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, after to-day's vote the good ministers of my State will understand why the 17 Democratic Congressmen and the 2 Democratic Senators from Texas could not vote for the Hoover-Mellon combination. We knew that it does not stand for prohibition.

We know something about the situation here that our good minister friends in Texas do not know. We know about the Green-Mellon bill, the gigantic liquor combine bill which our former Chairman Green, of the Committee on Ways and Means, introduced here last session, and which was prepared by Secretary Mellon, to create the greatest liquor combine ever dreamed of, and which authorized such a tremendous liquor combine that the Committee on Ways and Means turned it down.

And then we know about the Hawley liquor combine bill which Mr. Mellon immediately drew up and sent for Mr. HAWLEY to introduce as a substitute, which likewise would have created the greatest liquor monopoly ever known to the country, and over the strenuous protest made by myself and other prohibitionists this House passed it, but before it could get through the Senate, thank God, the people spoke through Bishop Cannon and others, and when Bishop Cannon speaks the people act upon his advice, and justly, and it died in the Senate.

I am not criticizing the preachers of my State, because from their standpoint they justly rebuked us, as they really thought Hoover would enforce and that Smith would not, because in rebuking us they rebuked the liquor traffic in my State and in the Nation; but they will find out to-day when this vote is over that they were mistaken on the proposition. They will find out that they can not expect any liquor enforcement from Mr. Hoover as long as Mr. Mellon has strings on the administration, and they will find that they can not expect it from the Republican administration in Congress.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I can not.

My friend from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], who has been a strong prohibitionist, and whose dry stand on many occasions I have admired, said he always found out where the liquor crowd was and it was a safe policy to vote against that crowd. He is here to-day following the rider of the great white charger from Baltimore, sitting in his place here, to add encouragement to his crowd and take them down the line. Call the roll and you will find every one of the real fundamental wets of the House lined up with the gentleman from Maine, and with the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], and with the other gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON], and with that great stalwart prohibitionist from Ohio, my good friend JOHN G. COOPER, and other Republican drys backing Mellon. Unfortunately they are obeying orders from the Treasury Department; they are obeying orders from the White House; they are obeying orders from the great influence that controls their party.

Oh, they say that I obeyed orders, possibly, in the last campaign. I say no. [Laughter.] Having no better alternative, through party loyalty to Democracy I supported a ticket that was repulsive to me. I supported a ticket and made speeches which embarrassed me, every one of them, when I made them. [Laughter.] But I want to say this: I told my people in every audience in Texas that I addressed that it was a choice between two evils; it was a choice for the American people to make, from which of the candidates could they expect the most of prohibition enforcement, and I knew they could not expect anything from Hoover and his Republican organization. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I might say that I have always been dry, politically and personally. [Applause.]

I come from a town that voted out the saloons 50 years ago. In this same town is Union College. The Kentucky Legislature 48 years ago passed an act making it unlawful to sell intoxicating liquors within 5 miles of this college.

I have always been an active supporter of the cause of prohibition in Congress and out of Congress. I favored the eighteenth amendment, voted for the Volstead Act, and every measure that has been before Congress since that time that would strengthen these measures. I stand foursquare for the honest and effective enforcement of our dry laws, as well as the other parts of the Constitution, but I can not support, ladies and gentlemen, this unsound and impracticable amendment. [Applause.]

What is the proposition now before us? As a general rule, this bill would be referred as a matter of course to the conferees of the House and Senate, and they would take up this matter and investigate it and report to the House and Senate. If we pass this rule that is now up for consideration, it will send this matter to conference. This amendment proposes to appropriate an additional $24,000,000. The need of this additional sum of money has not been investigated by any committee of the House or Senate.

After the conferees of the House and Senate have investigated this whole matter carefully, they will make report to the House and Senate, and then we will be better able to determine the best course to pursue. This $24,000,000 would not become available, anyhow, until July 1, 1929.

We must bear in mind, ladies and gentlemen, that this House has already appropriated millions and millions of dollars for this same purpose for the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1929. We have appropriated every dollar that has been asked for by the President, by the Director of the Budget, by the Treasury Department, and by the Department of Justice.

The President, the Director of the Budget, the Treasury Department, and the Department of Justice have not asked for this additional sum of $24,000,000, but on the contrary have declared their opposition to it. They say that Congress has provided all the money that can be used by the organization that we now have and can have by July 1 for this purpose, in a judicious and effective manner.

Since this matter was passed by the Senate, I have taken a thousand-mile trip through several States. On trains and everywhere, men and women were talking about this $24,000,000, and their expressions almost unanimously were along the lines of the editorial read to the House a few minutes ago by Mr. COOPER of Ohio to the effect that this is political bunk and that it is foolish and impracticable. [Applause.]

DEMOCRATIC POLITICS

I am against this amendment for several reasons. Many of my good friends on the Democratic side of the House coming from dry Democratic districts and dry States are in "bad" with their constituents because they helped to bring about the nomination and urged the election of Governor Smith, who is as wet as the Atlantic Ocean. I know they are in bad with their constituents, but they know it better than I do, and hence the zeal they are displaying in support of this $24,000,000 amendment. If these same politically dry Democratic friends had manifested half the zeal and used half the eloquence in their State conventions and at the Houston Convention for the dry cause that they are displaying to-day on the floor of this House, they would not have disappointed the fine Democratic men and women throughout the Nation who sincerely believe in the dry cause, by nominating Governor Smith for President of the United States. [Applause.]

When you good dry Democrats put up Governor Smith as your nominee and placed Mr. John Raskob, another wringing wet, at the head of your party, and they went about over this country denouncing the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, you did more harm to the dry cause than you gentlemen could do good for it if you should talk from this floor here for two months and appropriate $50,000,000. You are now trying to pay off the deficit of $1,600,000 of your campaign by selling Governor Smith's wet speeches. It has been just a little over two months ago that the good Democrats who are now making speeches for this amendment and professing so much interest in the dry cause were themselves going everywhere urging the election of Governor Smith. I have never in my life seen such unmitigated gall and inconsistency.

Governor Smith is still the titular head of the Democratic Party, and Mr. Raskob is still your national chairman, both of them unrelenting and bitter foes of prohibition. They are now leading your party, and you gentlemen ought to first get rid of them before you undertake to lecture us dry Republicans and lead the real friends of the dry cause and law enforcement.

I followed Mr. Hoover earnestly and sincerely last summer and fall because he stands for the eighteenth amendment and for its honest and effective enforcement, and I now refuse to follow the leadership of the Governor Smiths and the Raskobs on this important question. The great dry leaders of the Republican Party in the Senate are opposed to this proposition. The recognized dry leaders of the House—CRAMTON, STALKER, HERSEY, COOPER, and others—have spoken in opposition to it and are voting against it. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union women of the country who have so earnestly and sincerely through all of the years worked for the dry cause declare in a telegram to a Member of the House that they are looking to Mr. Hoover for real law enforcement, and so does the Council of Churches and other great dry organizations; and I, too, am looking to Mr. Hoover.

He comes into office on the 4th of March, and Congress will be in session this spring and summer, and I know that Mr. Hoover will have some great constructive plan to carry out his promise of law enforcement to the American people, and he will submit this to Congress, and I do not want him to be hampered or embarrassed by this so-called plan cooked up by the Democrats for their own selfish political advantage and who were themselves trying to put a sopping wet into the office, the highest in the gift of the American people, less than three months ago.

I refuse to join with the Smiths and the Raskobs in their effort to discredit the cause of prohibition and to embarrass and hinder Mr. Hoover and at the same time to spend $24,000,000 to get a lot of Democrats out of a hole that they placed themselves in by their support of Smith and Raskob.

IT WOULD HURT PROHIBITION

If this amendment should be adopted, it would not only embarrass Mr. Hoover's administration—it would be a willful waste of the taxpayers' money and hurt the dry cause. The leaders of the dry cause came before Congress and urged that we were not succeeding in the enforcement of the law because this service was in politics and the appointments were political. They urged us to put the prohibition enforcement under civil service, and Congress did that. The real friends of prohibition insisted that every person appointed to this service should be carefully investigated as to their ability, fitness, and integrity. We wanted to get away from the scandals in the prohibition service. The Civil Service Commission has held two examinations, inviting people throughout the land to make application. Thousands did make application, and the Civil Service Commission has been investigating these applicants; but up to this time they have not secured sufficient eligibles to fill the jobs for which we have already provided appropriations.

If we should dump this $24,000,000 on to the President without a trained personnel to use it, we would again have to resort to the political appointments and without civil-service examinations and investigations. We would simply add to the scandals that have already embarrassed the real friends of the dry cause, and this money would be more or less wasted, so that when the appropriation bill for dry-law enforcement comes up next Congress the wets would come forward and urge that prohibition was a failure and point out that they had given all the money that the departments asked for and this $24,000,000 in addition and that we had added to the scandals and had accomplished little for law enforcement.

The press indicates that Mr. Hoover proposes immediately following his assumption of the presidency to have a careful survey made of this question and find out in what way we can improve this service and what measures and money are necessary for effective and honest enforcement. I, for one, feel that this is the wise course to pursue. Let us give Mr. Hoover his chance.

I am one of those who think prohibition has succeeded wonderfully. I was State campaign chairman for the Republican Party in Kentucky in 1927 and 1928, and came in contact with many, many groups of people, and during all that time I did not see a drunken person. I spent nearly two weeks in Kansas City both before and at the time of the Republican National Convention, and saw thousands of people, but did not see a drunken person. It is making real progress. I have always believed in this noble experiment, and the way to strengthen and carry it forward to success is to proceed along sane, sound, and sensible lines.

FIFTY MILLION IF NECESSARY

When Mr. Hoover assumes office and has an opportunity to investigate and formulate a broad, sane, and effective policy for law enforcement and advises Congress that he needs additional money, I stand ready to vote for whatever measures and funds may be necessary in addition to what we have already provided, even though it may be double the amount called for in this amendment; but I am unwilling to be stampeded into wasting the taxpayers' money and perhaps discredit the cause for which we have fought and in which we are deeply interested, by following the leadership of the Smiths, Raskobs, and other Democratic politicians. [Applause.]

My dry Democratic friends from the South and West might as well understand that their party is now in the hands of the wets, and these wets are determined to make the Democratic Party a wet party, and there is no good reason why we dry Republicans should be led out into the swamps and abandoned like our dry Democratic friends were at the Houston convention and in the last November election.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, the people I have the honor to represent are in favor of modifying the Volstead Act. I find myself in rather strange company this afternoon in my opposition to this prohibition monstrosity. However, I want at this time to state that I disagree with certain portions of the statements of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. How can they deduce that the election of last year was a victory of the dry forces? It was neither a victory nor a defeat for the wet or dry forces. Their argument that the election of Mr. Hoover was a victory for the dry forces is not borne out by the results of the election. Nearly all of the States that Hoover lost are well known to be the driest of the dry, wherein the Ku-Klux Klan and Anti-Saloon League are exceptionally strong. The people of the State of Wisconsin in 1926, on a straight referendum, voted by a majority of almost 200,000 in favor of modification of the Volstead Act; and in the last election they voted by a majority of almost 100,000 in favor of Herbert Hoover. Not on the prohibition question, but because he was the best qualified candidate for the job. They voted for him because of his outstanding record of achievements and his position on great public questions such as the Great Lakes waterway and the protective tariff of the Republican Party. [Applause.]

I must say that while I am disappointed at some of the arguments of the distinguished gentlemen from Michigan and Ohio, I am pleased to find them casting aside the hired men of the Anti-Saloon League who are attempting to stampede Congress into passing this $24,000,000 prohibition monstrosity. Part of the $500,000 contributed to the Anti-Saloon League by the notorious Kresge, of New York, is no doubt being used to pay the salaries of these hired men and to pay the cost of their propaganda.

In his Milwaukee speech Governor Smith said that if we wanted the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act modified we should return the Democratic Party to power. If the Democratic Party was returned to power we would be no nearer modification than we are to-day. In fact, it would be a step backward, because man for man, the Democratic Party is the driest party in the land to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL].

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I can add nothing to the sound or substance of the debate but would make a few observations as to some of its peculiar angles; to wit, various Members from Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina advocating an appropriation of $24,000,000, which is not needed, which, if it passes, will kill any chance of an appropriation of $6,000,000 they are advocating for the rehabilitation of the devastated regions of their States, caused by the hurricane of a few months ago.

Again, I had supposed that when Will Upshaw retired from the House we would be without a vociferous leader of the prohibition forces when, behold, up steps Major LAGUARDIA, of New York, and assumes the leadership of the dry forces and defense of the eighteenth amendment.

Then my good friend, Mr. GARNER of Texas, consumes the time of the House to take another wallop at Andy Mellon. Texas showed good judgment in sending this statesman to Congress for the next two years, and I hope will repeat for many years to come. Texas also showed good judgment at the last election in going Republican and making sure that Mr. Mellon would be available and giving Mr. GARNER abundant opportunity to continue his feud and air his differences of opinion during a longer session.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman has referred to the good judgment of Texas. How about the good judgment of his own State?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I have shed more tears over that than the gentleman can imagine. I think Texas has shown good judgment, but I will not say much about the judgment of Massachusetts.

In closing I want to call attention to the uselessness of it all. We know the eighteenth amendment is here to stay and we only delude ourselves when we try to delude the public in a belief that there is a possibility of a change. Why can we not stop all of this foolishness and attend to business which will be of some benefit to the country and the public. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself five minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I think it rather important, before we come to an actual vote upon the previous question on this resolution, that the entire membership of the House fully apprehend and understand exactly what the concrete parliamentary issue will be upon that vote.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] stated in the beginning of his remarks that for the first time in his experience of some 12 or 14 years as a Member of this House, this extraordinary remedy of bringing in a rule to send a bill to conference has been resorted to. Well, gentlemen, if you will refer back to the controversy of only a few days ago upon the floor of this House, you will fully realize that remedy was required upon the part of the majority, not by any unusual obstruction upon the part of the minority Members of the House, but simply for the reason that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], in control of the appropriation bill, declined to give to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] categorical assurance that in the event the conferees were appointed he would, beyond all question, bring back and submit to the House of Representatives for its judgment these three very important controversial amendments that the Senate placed upon the House bill. This assurance was not given and the bill then had to go to the Committee on Appropriations or the majority leadership had to resort to this remedy of securing a rule, and the latter was adopted.

Now, gentlemen, it seems to me that the issues in this case are plain. A good deal has been said in the course of this debate that in my opinion is not entirely relevant to the real issues involved here, but under the parliamentary situation the only possible way now that those of us who favor some instruction to the conferees upon these three important amendments, those of us who desire to have the Senate of the United State secure some expression from the Representatives in this body as to their attitude upon these important problems; the only possible way that we can get an opportunity, even though we should be in the minority upon the final vote, to register our opinion is to vote down the previous question when called for upon the adoption of this resolution; and this, gentlemen, would give to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the ranking member on the Appropriations Committee, the opportunity of offering the amendments which he read to the House a few moments ago with reference to this prohibition enforcement item. It would also afford opportunity to amend this rule so as to have a vote now on these amendments.

Gentlemen, these are important questions that are involved here. There is not only the question of prohibition, but also the tremendously important question which has occupied considerable time here upon the floor of the House this session, the question of fixing some regulation for the payment of refunds and the allowance of credits upon income taxes. I am sure that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] impressed upon the membership of this House the absolute importance, in justice to the Federal Treasury and to the taxpayers of this country, of undertaking to set up some form of regulatory machinery that would provide for the orderly auditing of these tremendous amounts of money before they are paid out of the Federal Treasury. This is involved in one of these amendments. It is a matter of importance to your constituents, however you may feel with reference to the prohibition question.

Then there is a provision inserted in the Senate upon the insistence of a well-known prohibitionist.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself six minutes more, as I have no further requests for time on this side.

If you will refer to page 17 of the pending bill you will find amendment No. 17, proposed by the Senator from Virginia, Senator CARTER GLASS. I am sure that the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Wisconsin can find no legitimate quarrel with the long and well-established reputation of that great Senator as an ardent advocate of the real cause of prohibition, although they might find some opportunity to question his position upon that question during the late national campaign. But, gentlemen, I want to call the attention of the Republican membership of this House to just exactly what the Glass amendment does.

Every one of you who will refresh his recollection with reference to the position of Mr. Hoover during the presidential campaign upon this question, will remember he asserted that he recognized there were many grave abuses with reference to the enforcement of the Volstead Act and the enforcement of the statutes made in pursuance thereof as far as regulation and control were concerned; that as a student of public affairs he solemnly acknowledged, regardless of his attitude upon the main question of the eighteenth amendment, that there was a broad and legitimate field for investigation upon the part of the Executive of this country for the purpose of undertaking to ascertain what remedy, if any, could be suggested and effectuated to correct that situation; and he stated in his campaign that if he were elected, soon after his inauguration he would take steps to appoint a commission to inquire into these abuses for the purpose not only of making recommendations to the Executive, but I imagine for the benefit of the lawmaking branch of the country. And what does this amendment do, I ask those of you who are advocating Mr. Hoover's position upon this question? It simply carries into effect, in plain and simple terms, with an adequate appropriation for its enforcement, this plan and gives an opportunity to the incoming President immediately upon his inauguration, to take the steps which he has indicated he thinks are so sorely needed. Can you find quarrel with that? Is there any politics in that? How can the Republican membership of this House in good conscience assert that simply because a Democratic Senator has made possible at this session of Congress the realization of your President elect's views upon this question, that you are going to turn it down, although it expresses those views, and then say it ought to be defeated simply because it is suggested by sinister political considerations?

Now, gentlemen, I have heard some strange language used here to-day upon the floor of this House. I did not think I would ever live to see the day when gentlemen, like my amiable friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] particularly, would stand upon the floor of this House and absolutely exhaust the vocabulary of scorn and contumely in opprobrium of those gentlemen naming some specific bishops in the last campaign whose support before the election he was seeking "even as the hart panteth after the water brook." [Applause.]

He comes in here this afternoon, this reputed leader of the dry forces in the Congress of the United States—whether the gentleman modestly disclaims it or not, he is so recognized by others—yet he says this great bishop of the Methodist Church, however earnestly and zealously he labored in the cause of what he conceived to be for the best interests of prohibition—you say that he and all his associates in the moral cause represented by the Anti-Saloon League, are impostors and that they are all playing politics merely for the purpose of rehabilitating their political status.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has no right to put words in my mouth that I did not utter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the logical and legitimate inference to be drawn from the words the gentleman uttered. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

These gentlemen, driven into a cul-de-sac, recognized the inconsistency of their position, come in here and in a quasi-humorous way, with scantily clothed sophistry, assert that the whole argument on the other side is based on politics.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will take the remainder of my time.

I want to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan, and my good friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], and others who on the floor of this House have made arguments that this is purely an issue to readjust and rehabilitate the political fortunes, and to discredit the incoming administration of Mr. Hoover, to turn to pages 2059–2060, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and although I can not advert to the individual votes of Senators, they will see that by a vote of 50 to 27 the resolution embodying the Harris amendment was passed in the Senate of the United States. If the gentlemen will be courageous enough and fair enough to examine the personnel of the vote they will see many distinguished Republican Senators, and many who are as ardently dry as the gentleman from Michigan, voted for the amendment.

Gentlemen, it will not do to answer that the proposition was confined to politics. I will tell you how I am actuated in my vote. I represent what I know to be a dry district down in Alabama, I imagine that at least 90 per cent of my constituents are in favor of the enforcement of the law—the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law. They know from evidences around them and from evidences brought to them from other parts of the country that in the last six years the Republican administration have not only had no enforcement of the prohibition law but what is much worse they feel that there has not been any honest effort to try and enforce the prohibition law. [Applause.]

I have no fault to find with the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] on my side of the House, or the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], or the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], who are admittedly wet, who do not favor the eighteenth amendment but, my friends, in closing this debate upon this rule I make an earnest and sincere appeal to all gentlemen, leaders on the floor of the House, who pretend to and do believe in prohibition and in an honest effort to enforce it, to express by their vote that desire and obligation. [Applause.]

You are not going to be able, in my opinion, to deceive the American people with reference to this thing—to go out and tell them it was merely a vote on a parliamentary proposition. That is what you will do, I know that will be your excuse, and that will be your subterfuge, because you can not answer otherwise. You will say that this proposition was merely a vote on the previous question, but I want to assert and place it in the RECORD now, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] said in his splendid and illuminating address, that the issue is squarely presented to you and the American people themselves will understand it. [Applause.]

I say to you, consider what your constituents, if they were here in this gallery this afternoon, would instruct you to do upon the merits, upon the essence, upon the very legislative sacrament of this proposition. I have no doubt that a great majority of your constituents from the dry districts if they were here would personally instruct you this afternoon to vote for the opportunity to make the prohibition laws of the country effective in an honest way.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. If this amendment is defeated, will not the wet forces throughout the country claim a great victory against prohibition?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I assume they would, and they would be entitled to do so.

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. YON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] intimated a while ago that if this amendment were put through, the rehabilitation measures that are pending for Florida, Georgia, and South Carolina would not pass. Has the gentleman any intimation that they would not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no intimation on that subject.

Mr. YON. Does the gentleman think it is fair should this bill pass that they shall be held up?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not acquainted with the merits of the proposition to which the gentleman refers, but they should in no way be fairly affected by the result of the vote on this rule or the adoption of the prohibition amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in considering this amendment, which provides for an additional appropriation of $24,00,000 to be used for prohibition enforcement, I have come to the conclusion it is an unwarranted raid on the Federal Treasury and should be defeated. I know no political party, nor do I think of my own political welfare in arriving at my decision.

Why should I vote to take from the Public Treasury $24,000,000 to be used in an effort to enforce prohibition when the officials charged with the responsibility of enforcement openly declare there is not only no need for such an expenditure but they would not know how to use the money if Congress set aside such an amount for that purpose?

To consider this matter from a political standpoint is a position that can not be defended, nor should the views of the Member on the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead law be taken into consideration.

The Director of the Budget in a speech during the week says we are facing a deficit which might amount to $100,000,000 by July 1 unless drastic action is taken. Every Member of this House, regardless of political affiliations, should join in an effort to prevent such a condition. Personally, I now assure the Republican leaders they will receive my support in their efforts to keep appropriations within the revenues. This is a good time to commence the work.

The enforcement of prohibition has been discussed for years in both branches of Congress. Those possessing liberal views have been assailed for stating that enforcement has broken down. Now, however, we find the author of the amendment declaring enforcement up to this time has been a farce. He simply affirms the statements so often made on this floor and so vigorously denied by dry leaders. When those of us who are opposed to the eighteenth amendment and Volstead law have stated enforcement has broken down or the effort was a farce, we have been assailed by the leading drys. Now we find the advocates of prohibition taking the position that those opposed long since have taken.

This is but one of a number of methods prohibitionists—especially those who delight in rising on this floor and proudly proclaiming they were in part responsible for creating the sentiment that resulted in the adoption of the eighteenth amendment—advance to better conditions. A few days ago the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL] tells us "we" are now preparing bills shortly to be introduced that will, when enacted, make the United States as dry as a desert. He does not disclose who the "we" represent, but, startling as his suggestions are, there is one advanced which I predict will cause even dry advocates to rebel against and that is the suggestion to do away with trial by jury. Of course, Congress can not do this by the enactment of a bill, as it will require an amendment to the Constitution, and before such an amendment is ever ratified by the States the eighteenth amendment will have been repealed.

In reference to the argument that those opposing this appropriation will be charged with hamstringing enforcement is answered by Dr. James M. Doran, Commissioner of Prohibition. Only last week he told me that he would not know what to do with the money if it was appropriated.

I do strongly criticize the methods used at times by enforcement officers and feel justified for so doing. I have on my desk at the present time a letter from a business man in St. Louis asking me to advise him if there is any law under which he can be reimbursed for damages suffered due to one of his salesmen accepting employment as a prohibition agent, without his knowledge and using his position as salesman to entrap citizens of St. Louis to violate the prohibition laws. This man, Merritt D. Padfield, sold paper to the retail trade, including proprietors of beverage parlors. He was employed by the Prohibition Unit last June, but continued his work as a paper salesman, he says, as a side line. That he worked with the approval of the Prohibition Unit as an undercover man is evident because he did not apply for a search warrant until a day or two before Christmas, when 61 arrests were made. He induced his paper customers to sell liquor or beer to him and a "friend," also a prohibition agent. The president of the paper concern, Mr. Russell W. Meredith, says his prosperous business has been ruined by the activities of this salesman. He has tried without success to find some legal course of action he could take against either the salesman or Government, but we all know there is no statute under which he can recover damages. In one instance the salesman, when denied liquor by a customer, had the man call the company and ask the proprietor if Padfield was in their employ, and when told he was, secured the liquor for him.

The search and seizure amendment to the Constitution is violated almost daily by the prohibition agents. I have introduced a bill making it a felony for a Government officer to violate the fourth or fifth amendment to the Consitution; but of course the dry leaders will not sanction such action, and my bill sleeps quietly in the archives of the Judiciary Committee.

Within a week I read where a girl, a stenographer by day, is employed by night by prohibition officials to drink liquor and secure evidence; officers in charge of a posse killed a 6-year old girl riding with her parents near Windsor, Mo., while looking for suspicious characters thought to have liquor; a man was killed and a woman companion seriously injured when officers fired shotguns at an automobile thought to contain a load of Canadian whisky near Stella, Mo. It is only fair to state these officers in both the case of the young girl and the man and his companion were not Federal officers, but they claim they were trying to enforce prohibition laws. Federal agents do not visit dry territory in my State but confine their efforts to St. Louis and Kansas City, not destroying the source of supply but in 90 per cent of the cases arresting men and women charged with selling a drink of liquor or a bottle of beer.

Another occurrence worthy of special mention also within the last week was the raiding of a factory in my district where about 150 ladies are employed. Three brothers, Leo, Frank, and Joseph Bussman, manufacturers of the Bussman lamps sold all over the United States, operate a large electrical-appliance factory. Entering the factory by means of a ruse two Federal agents later appeared before the United States commissioner and swore to a warrant stating they had seen a barrel of whisky in the factory. Armed with the warrant, they raided the factory, carrying an ax and threatened to break up factory equipment if the whisky was not produced. They are charged by the proprietor with using profane language and threatening some of the women employees. In the end they claim to have found 10 ounces of alcohol. The alcohol did not belong to the employers but probably to one of the many employees. Still the agents arrested all three officers of the firm, charging them with possession of intoxicating liquors. Such methods should not be tolerated.

I see no reason to squander public funds—badly needed at the present time—by giving $24,000,000 additional for prohibition enforcement when the Secretary of the Treasury, the Commissioner of Prohibition, and all other Government officials charged with enforcement of this law say they do not want it and can not use it.

I am strongly of the opinion the people of the country, wet and dry alike, will condemn, rather than commend, those responsible for the effort to waste $24,000,000 of public funds.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS].

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, with us people out in the cornfields in the Middle West, who found the liquor traffic operating to our disadvantage, started the idea of driving the saloons out of business. The practical operation of the enforcement of the prohibition law has been that the people there have quit electing men and women to administrative, judicial, legislative, and law-enforcing offices who are going around "winking" to the other fellow that the prohibition law can not be enforced. We have brought enforcement down to about a petty larceny basis. You will never stamp out petty or grand larceny, but we can keep it down where we can live with it. We have it down to a point where we can live with prohibition enforcement better than we could with the liquor traffic. We have driven the professional bootlegger out into the large centers of population, and in some of those centers, I do not care how many law-enforcement officers you have, you could not enforce the law until it gets so that they can not live with it. Take places like Springfield and Chicago, and they are now rising up in arms and saying that we have got to suppress the bootleggers and crooks and that they are going to run them out. With reference to running them out, we are not going to let them run them back into our districts. Here is what the Champaign Gazette says about the lament from Chicago, where they have had a large amount of disregard for law enforcement:

> We should be prepared so that if any of the thugs get an idea of coming around here to pull off any of their rough stuff they'll get the crack in the ear that they deserve. Champaign County has the reputation of treating 'em rough, the treatment given the diamond bandit being a sample, and let's see that that reputation is sustained. The community has been unusually free from crime for many months, and every care should be taken to keep it so. Lack of preparation in view of the Chicago situation might result in serious consequences—it will be too late then to offer a lot of alibis. You know the old saying, "An ounce of prevention, etc." Now is the time.

The bootlegger doing business on a large scale has naturally got away from the communities where the communities elect judges, State attorneys, mayors, sheriffs, and city councils who are in sympathy with the prohibition law and gone into the centers where they elect officers not in sympathy with prohibition enforcement. Lawbreakers generally will naturally go to the communities where there is liberal treatment of liquor-law violators. Look the country over and you will find these "havens of refuge" getting fewer in number and their lawless element no doubt increasing. When they get to the point that it is dangerous to live with them, the citizens usually have a "house cleaning" and restore good government. In communities of that kind, no matter how many Federal officers you had or how many arrests made, few convictions would be had. Local public sentiment is the greatest law-enforcing agency we have. If the Government should spend this entire $24,000,000 on such communities, I think the enterprise would fail.

I do not think my people expect the Federal Government to police their towns. They can do that themselves.

I think the Federal Government should use its agencies to keep the supply of "booze" from coming in from other countries, suppress interstate shipments and other large sources of illicit supplies. The "petit-larceny" stuff in local communities will be taken care of by local authorities when conditions get where they have to do it.

An institution that had been with us as long as the liquor traffic has, I think we have made very good progress up to date.

My information is this body voted the department all the money they asked for to enforce the Volstead Act, and when I heard of this proposal to give the department $24,000,000 they had not asked for, had made no provision to use in any way, I did not give it a serious thought. In my legislative experience, both State and national, I have observed it was always a serious problem to provide money enough for the various agencies of government to function properly and at the same time not place an unbearable burden on the taxpayer.

This is certainly an unusual procedure to hand over $24,000,000 of the people's money there is no call for and no program for its use, and as I see it no justifiable reason for doing so. This wet-and-dry "bugaboo" that has been raised here this afternoon I do not take any stock in. I think everybody knows there is not 100 so-called wet votes in this House.

I think everyone knows if the Hoover administration needs more money for law enforcement this House will vote for it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WELLER].

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I have listened with a great deal of attention this afternoon to the debate, especially to that part of the debate coming from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER], wherein they stated, and apparently were glad to do so, that the liquor question was the question that defeated Governor Smith as the Democratic nominee for the Presidency of the United States. I say that that is not the fact. Any man, who, as the leader of his party, could obtain 15,000,000 votes in the United States deserves recognition not only for his statesmanship but for his integrity and the things that he has accomplished. He has been four times elected Governor of the Empire State of New York. [Applause.] My friends, what defeated Governor Smith was something far more insidious, far more diabolical than that. In this country of ours where we boast of religious freedom, cradled as it was at Plymouth Rock and continued on by our forefathers in the Constitution, 1787–1789, the Ku-Klux Klan with its insidious propaganda was shot into the campaign. I, as a member of the Methodist Church for over 40 years, resent the propaganda and the snakelike virulent poison which was resorted to in this campaign. I resent it because it is un-American and unfair. That is what defeated Governor Smith for the Presidency of the United States. [Applause.] Our proud boast of religious freedom became a mockery.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WELLER. May I have a half minute more?

The SPEAKER. All time has expired on that side.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a paragraph from the message of Gov. Alfred E. Smith to the legislature at Albany on January 4, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The extract referred to is as follows:

In the meanwhile, there devolves upon the State the sacred duty of sustaining the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead law. They are as much a part of the laws of this State as our own statutes and our own constitution. In fact, the Constitution of the United States itself declares that document and the laws made pursuant to it to be the supreme law of the land and the judges in every State bound thereby, anything in the constitution and the laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. Aside from the limited number of policemen who patrol the sparsely settled sections of the State, the State's police power is delegated and we find it exercised in the first instance by the village constable, the sheriffs, and deputy sheriffs, and the police officials of the cities. I speak only the truth when I say that the people of any locality get the degree of law enforcement upon which they insist and for which they are willing to pay. As far as I am concerned, in obedience to my oath to sustain the Constitution of the United States, I have repeatedly promised the people that so far as it lies in my power in the constitutional or statute law, I will remove from office upon proper proof being presented, any public official charged with laxity in enforcement of the law. Obedience to law is the foundation stone upon which the structure of government rests. Uniform enforcement, uniform obedience is necessary to preserve the dignity and the majesty of the law. Law enforcement must of necessity begin with arrest (p. 90).

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, before beginning my remarks, I wish to ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the rule now under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on this legislation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes at my disposal I wish to refer to two points which seem to me have not been sufficiently impressed. The first is that this is not and can not by any distortion of fact be made a contest between wets and drys. We have only to turn to the speeches which have been made here to-day and the men who have made these speeches to prove my statement. Men who have directly opposite views on the general question of prohibition are voting side by side on this resolution, both for and against it. Here is my friend from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] and also my friend from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] as examples on the dry side supporting the rule to send the bill to conference and opposing the $24,000,000 appropriation. Their honesty as well as their zeal in the prohibition cause is well known. On the other side of the aisle sitting before me is the gentleman from Maryland and a considerable number of others on his side who are conscientiously wet, but are supporting the same side in this controversy as the two earnest drys just mentioned, and all of these on both sides are entirely consistent so far as the proposed appropriation is concerned.

On the other side of the controversy we find the gallant young champion of the wets from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] urging the appropriation of the $24,000,000, and as much more as any enthusiast will suggest to prove that prohibition can not be enforced regardless of the amount appropriated.

Therefore I say that this is not a contest between the wets and drys, so that no one need fear having the slightest difficulty in explaining his vote on this score.

Coming through the Speaker's lobby a few minutes ago I heard an honored Democratic Member—I do not know whether he knew that I heard him—say that what was troubling him was the difficulty he had in determining how much of the proposed $24,000,000 appropriation is politics and how much of it common sense. I felt inclined to tell him that there was more of the former than of the latter. The political side, however, has been liberally discussed here to-day, and I shall not go further into it, but I shall refer to the common-sense side of it.

For what other purpose could an appropriation of $24,000,000, without an estimate from any department, without the approval of the Budget, without consideration by a committee, be brought into this House and receive serious consideration. A Member who attempted to bring such a proposition before the House on any other subject would be laughed to scorn. It would be said at once that such a course of procedure could not be good common sense. It would be pointed out at once that there should be an estimate and that it should have the approval of the Budget.

We now set great store by the Budget—and well we may because it has assisted greatly in systematizing appropriations and bringing about efficiency as well as economy. What will happen if a proposal of this sort, carrying a large sum of money sufficient to cause a deficit in the Treasury, can be brought in here by a haphazard amendment, without consideration by a department of the Government or the Budget, and passed without even knowing what it is going to be used for? If this should become the practice the budget system is doomed. [Applause.]

Is there a single good reason why we should proceed in the manner proposed by this amendment? Has there been an occasion, when, after consideration and an estimate by the proper department and a recommendation by the Budget, that an appropriation for prohibition enforcement has been refused? Has there been an occasion at any time when an appropriation asked for by a department and approved by the Budget has been refused by Congress for this purpose? Does anyone here believe for a moment that there will arise an occasion when funds will be refused by the Congress for the proper enforcement of the prohibition law? Then why should we proceed in this very unusual manner to disregard our budget system and make a huge appropriation for an uncertain, or at least, an undefined purpose? Ordinarily this House shies at large lump-sum appropriations without having a very clear understanding of the purposes for which they are to be expended. There is no justifiable cause for deviating in this instance from that very wise and wholesome rule.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to take just a short time to close this debate.

I am very much surprised at the statement made by my good friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who has a record in this House as being a very careful and consistent legislator in every respect. I am wondering whether he truly expressed himself in his speech to-day or at the time when he made a statement in the House, on December 18, 1928, relative to the other large appropriation that was proposed for the enforcement of prohibition. I want to call the attention of the House to the statement the gentleman from Tennessee made on that occasion, when he said:

I was unwilling, in the face of the fact that we are confronted with a deficit, which seems to be inevitable if the figures of the Treasury Department are correct, to vote $250,000,000 out of the United States Treasury when we have no program before us and no intimation or idea as to just how it would be expended if it were so appropriated and no request from the administration for further funds.

[Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

I wonder whether the gentleman was speaking, according to the record on that occasion, or was speaking for himself to-day as a conscientious legislator?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I can not yield at this time. Well, I want to be perfectly fair, and I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. The proposition, then, was to put $250,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I said in that speech that I would vote for $25,000,000, and even $50,000,000. I would oppose now, as I did then, the appropriation of $250,000,000 for the Prohibition Unit alone. Why does not the gentleman read all of the remarks which I made at that time.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman can put that in the RECORD if he likes. But what I have quoted was the closing remark that the gentleman made on December 18, 1928, and stated at that time that we had no requests for further funds.

Mr. BYRNS. Since then has not the Secretary of the Treasury said he needed money for the Coast Guard and the border patrol?

Mr. SNELL. There has been no statement made that he needed additional funds.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves the previous question. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Those in favor of ordering the previous question, when their names are called, will answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, nays 141, not voting 47, as follows:

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the proposal to add $24,000,000 to the present deficiency appropriation bill for the alleged purpose of furnishing additional funds to aid law enforcement comes before the House through an amendment adopted by the Senate. During the debate on this resolution to send the bill to conference various arguments have been offered for and against the $24,000,000 Senate item, but the real issue, to my mind, is smothered by irrelevant matters.

It is alleged that the $24,000,000 is needed for better enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. If that is the real issue, then Congress, on the request of any responsible governmental agency, by an overwhelming majority, would, unquestionably, appropriate double that amount, if asked for by any law-enforcement agency. The constitutional amendment is law; and during the last campaign both political parties advocated enforcement of the law. Whether the Senate amendment is offered to rehabilitate the Democratic Party, as has been repeatedly claimed by Republican speakers, or whether it is offered to disclose the inadequacy of ten times that amount, as claimed by the wet advocates, is not the issue.

No governmental agency has asked for $24,000,000 or $240,000,000 or for any other amount to enforce the law, in addition to that requested in the Budget. Of course, no sacredness attaches to $24,000,000 or any other figure that has arbitrarily been added to the bill in the Senate. In fact, opponents of the law declare they support the $24,000,000 amendment to demonstrate its ineffectiveness to enforce.

Personally, I believe law enforcement properly belongs to the Department of Justice and that a transfer to that department of eighteenth amendment violations would result in specific recommendations for additional judges and other needed officials to aid enforcement.

Opponents to the law argue that Secretary Mellon is not in sympathy with the law now administered by the Treasury Department; that neither $24,000,000 or any other amount will bring enforcement; and yet with few exceptions they are urging this amendment. Men of national prominence who favor law enforcement are confronted by this argument, but with legislators are asked to subscribe to the spectacle of Greeks bearing gifts intended only to confuse or destroy.

President Coolidge and President Hoover will be charged with the disbursement of the $24,000,000. Both have protested against the unbusinesslike proceeding of placing that responsibility on them when not asked for by any governmental agency.

Its disbursement or lack of disbursement would be certain to meet criticism from business and political sources, and the proposal is a legislative gesture that does not reflect credit on the intelligence or sincerity of the American Congress. Such a proposal would be deemed childish and inexcusable if loaded onto a village president against his protest. It would invite certain bankruptcy if a similar policy was adopted by any business interest, from a great corporation to a corner grocery store, and the American Congress represents the world's greatest corporation.

SHIFTING OUR RESPONSIBILITY

Surely we can not lend ourselves to a policy in times of peace of delegating to the President the determination of how $24,000,000 or $240,000,000 should be spent. That is our responsibility.

Congress, without strings, gave $100,000,000 to President Wilson in time of war, and while the necessities of the case required such action and the war covered a multitude of excusable extravagances, the heritage of a $100,000,000 Muscle Shoals power plant, repeatedly defeated in time of peace, was made possible only by such delegation of authority during war.

For several years items involving many millions of dollars recommended by River and Harbor Committees for navigation, Military Committees for nitrates, and Agricultural Committees for fertilizer at Muscle Shoals were successfully opposed prior to the war. Thereafter the expenditures at Government expense occurred by Executive order.

My own opposition to old-time "pork barrels," whether carried by river and harbor, public buildings, or other bills brought home the fact that committees, made up of Members having projects, were necessarily subjected to undue pressure under the old system that involved many independent appropriation committees. After a long struggle one of the greatest reforms ever brought about in Congress occurred with the passage of the national Budget law in 1921. That law prevents loose methods of legislation and has saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the Federal Treasury in the brief time it has been in force.

Realizing that our Federal Government was a corporation no different in character than other governments so far as its financial resources and disbursements were concerned, I urged repeatedly the adoption of a national budget. Without arrogating to myself any credit for legislative agitation or adoption of the Budget law that followed, I am forcibly reminded by to-day's proceedings of a 40-minute speech made December 14, 1917, on House Resolution 157 based on a resolution I had introduced for a national budget system.

At that time and during the World War I said:

No sermon on the imperative necessity of strict public economy could be more impressive than a brief review of cold statistics I have offered which carry their own unanswerable argument, and it is because of this critical time in the Nation's history when governments are changing form and the toll of life and property is beyond human comprehension that this law-making body should meet the problem without evasion or legislative quibbling.

After referring to messages of President Taft and efforts to enact a budget law in the Sixty-second Congress, I added:

A budget will require annual submission of carefully prepared estimates by the different departments of all proposed expenditures to a control agency there to be reviewed, pruned, and approved before submission to Congress for consideration. Congress will then intelligently determine what should be allowed for the support of government * * *. It will tend toward wise and disinterested consideration of appropriation bills, increased efficiency, curtailment of legislative logrolling, public waste and extravagance, and will materially shorten sessions of Congress. * * * Practically every government on earth—some 50 in number—have adopted some form of public budget in order to promote efficiency, economy, and responsibility. Our own Government alone invites wholesale extravagance by refusing to adopt any intelligent legislative financial policy.

During this hour of national peril will our Democratic friends repudiate their party pledge and disregard their leader's (President Wilson's) request or will they, in fact as well as words, join hands with this side of the aisle and unitedly stand by the President in this effort to prevent public waste?

A budget resolution was set forth in full following the speech.

Our Democratic friends ignored their party pledge made at St. Louis in 1916, which advocated a single appropriation committee as a "practicable first step toward a budget system," and even as late as June 24, 1919, one of their most conspicuous and honored leaders expressed the "futility" of any budget legislative hopes. From another fairly lengthy discussion of the same subject on the above date I quote after prior interrogations by ex-Speaker Clark:

Mr. FREAR. The budget committee has the preparation of the revenues and the expenditures of the revenues of the Government. That is the proper place for its consideration, the same as other governments. Every government on the face of the earth has a budget system except ours, and in no other government is there so much carelessness and so much looseness in regard to appropriations. I do not say this is the only practical budget system, but I say that any good budget system that contains the propositions I have mentioned will prove a great improvement over our present system. Of course, you will have to do away with your 14 appropriating committees, having control over 14 to 20 appropriation bills. That is a first and a hard proposal to accept.

CHAMP CLARK, THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take up the gentleman's time——

Mr. FREAR. I do not feel that I have the right to refuse to yield to the distinguished ex-Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will get some more time; but this is one of the most important questions that has been discussed since I have been here. Has the gentleman ever figured on these 14 appropriation bills coming from 7 appropriating committees? There are 21 Members on each committee, and seven times 21 is 147. You have 147 Members against you to start with.

Mr. FREAR. I appreciate that, and it is a far larger number than you have stated. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Sherley, when chairman of the Appropriations Committee, said to me, "You will have over 200 against you to start with." But we are going to make the fight through public sentiment, and we must convince our own membership it is right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not opposed to it. I am just suggesting to you the futility of talking about it.

Mr. FREAR. We have never got anywhere or anything on earth that we have not talked about. I know that the distinguished ex-Speaker, with all the power that he possesses, must be in sympathy with the proposition of saving time and saving money and——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes; of course; and I am in sympathy with getting up some kind of a scheme to induce Members to come here and attend to business.

Mr. FREAR. * * * I realize great obstacles that the ex-Speaker has mentioned, and I know the opposition to the project, and what is true here is true with respect to the body at the other end of the Capitol, and Senators are more jealous of their rights, their powers, and perquisites than are the Members of this body. But it has got to come. * * *

EX-SPEAKER JOE CANNON SAID THE BUDGET LAW FIGHT WAS FUTILE

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Certainly to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Under our Constitution, with a Senate that changes one-third of its membership every two years, and with a House that changes every two years, how in the world can you have a budget governing the whole public service and get anything out of it? As I understand it, in Great Britain, when their budget is turned down, they go to the people at an election. You can not do that here. I suppose that is also so in France, and I suppose it is so in Italy.

Mr. FREAR. If the distinguished Republican ex-Speaker, to whom we all listen with profound respect, as we also listen to ex-Speaker Clark, will reflect a moment, they will both realize that when the Republican Party challenges the record of the Democratic administration, or when the Democratic Party challenges the record of a Republican administration, we must stand on our record, on the moneys we demand and vote, and if a Republican Congress does not give a Democratic administration a sufficient amount of money to properly run the Government the public at large will not retain us in the service, but will turn us out. That is our responsibility. In other countries to which reference has been made they oust the ministry. Here we can not do that. It will take time to make necessary changes, but fundamentally the same principle is at the bottom of it. Under this resolution that I have proposed and under the two bills that are proposed we would have the same situation as exists in Great Britain, where an enormous amount of time and an enormous amount of money is saved compared with our lack of system. * * *

* * * * * * * *

Mr. FREAR. I realize, as both distinguished ex-Speakers have said, that it is hard to attempt to outline in brief time the importance of this subject, but I am going to insert the bills, resolution, and other data, and if you will do me the honor to read them you will find a way pointed out, and you will find I have outlined not only the faults of the present system but the object to be attained by a new real budget plan.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes. If he can devise a way to get a budget, I would like to hear of it. I am not opposed to the budget. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 10 minutes. * * *

I have quoted briefly from my remarks in the House during the fight for a budget law to disclose that ex-Speakers Clark and Cannon, two of the most able men of this body during the last quarter of a century, both expressed the futility and hopelessness of any budget law for the United States. Less than a decade ago we were drifting financially in legislation without star or compass. We regulated our income by our expenditures. Then we passed the law to prevent such an amendment as that offered by the Senate and now before us.

Under the budget law we seek now to limit expenditures to income and to use the same judgment an individual would use in the regulation of his own business or family expenditures.

I repeat that no sensible man doubts that, irrespective of returns from fines or penalties that lessen actual costs of enforcement, Congress will appropriate every dollar asked for by any responsible governmental agency for law enforcement, and this applies to every governmental activity, whether it concerns the eighteenth amendment, narcotics, immigration, or other law violations.

The President has repeatedly called our attention to the necessity of observing Budget recommendations if we are to keep within income and estimates.

Congress should do this without Executive warning because the responsibility is ours under the law. Not one valid excuse or argument has been offered for this $24,000,000 super budget expenditure, nor for the unprecedented effort to load such expenditure onto an executive who repudiates the act in advance. To do so in opposition to the clear intent of the Budget law and against the announced opposition of the President is a spectacle that does not reflect credit on a body that makes a pretense of enforcing individual compliance with law by itself violating a plain provision of law and also of the Constitution that places responsibility for all expenditures with Congress.

I have not mentioned the charge that the $24,000,000 amendment is intended for political claptrap or for the rehabilitation of a political party or to injure law enforcement by its claimed futility.

These charges are beside the question and of slight importance compared with an effort to destroy the integrity of the Budget law without the shadow of an excuse for such action. Emergency expenditures will ever be called for by deficiency appropriations, but the Senate $24,000,000 amendment or any other amount is without any official sanction by those who have been selected by law. For that reason the resolution sending to conference should be passed, and the Senate conferees, without prejudice, should strike out this item because of the reasons mentioned. If any effort to prevent needed law enforcement appropriations is ever offered in either branch of Congress it may be necessary to propose amendments to that end, and they will be passed overwhelmingly. The purpose of this amendment, however, is not to meet any failure of such duty on the part of the Appropriation Committee or of either branch of Congress.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I know that there is no occasion for me to use any of the time allowed me in the debate on this amendment to state to my colleagues my position on the eighteenth amendment or the Volstead Act for the enforcement by the Government of the same.

I gave six of the best years of my life to the writing into Michigan's constitution a prohibition amendment and then the enacting of an enforcement code that is equal, if not superior, to the Volstead law. The State amendment and its enforcement law has stood the test of every assault upon it as has the Volstead law of the national enforcement code, and the question of the prohibition of the beverage liquor traffic is firmly established in the State constitution as it is in the national Constitution.

The history of legislation in this Nation reveals the fact that no prohibitory law that has lived through 10 years has been repealed. I stand ready to-day to vote for any appropriation in any amount, be it $5,000,000 or $50,000,000 for the enforcement of the law, when such appropriation is requested by any or all departments that have to do with its enforcement and it can be shown how it can be used effectively, or upon the request of the President, who in theory, if not in practice, is responsible for the well-being and safety of this Nation of ours.

In the matter before us to-day of adding to the deficiency appropriation bill an item of $24,000,000 for enforcement, there has been no such request or suggestion. In fact, 60 days have not elapsed since every one of these departments has been before the Appropriations Committee on two separate occasions, first in the drafting of the regular appropriation bill covering the actions of these branches for the coming fiscal year and then again covering their requirements in this very bill, the first deficiency bill, now before us. On neither occasion did they separately or together suggest they could efficiently use any such an amount of money, this year or next year. The fact is that this body did enlarge their original estimates where it was found such additional amounts could be used.

No, my colleagues, this does not come before us fairly on its merits as a matter of adequate enforcement of the prohibition law, but rather as a clever political move, which it is thought will catch the fancy of people who desire the best conditions before they can have time to analyze just what is involved here.

On Tuesday morning I received, as I apprehend you, my colleagues, all did, a letter from Dr. F. Scott McBride, general superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America, asking support for the amendment and giving, at some length, the reason for his position. The press had carried a statement a few days before which indicated his opposition. This, he said, was a misconception of his position.

I immediately sent the following reply:

JANUARY 28, 1929.

Mr. F. SCOTT MCBRIDE,
General Superintendent Anti-Saloon League of America,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR DOCTOR MCBRIDE: Your circular letter of January 28 is on my desk this morning, and I note with great interest your appeal and reasons for the adoption of the Senate amendment to the first deficiency bill, providing $24,000,000 for the enforcement of the national prohibition law.

Even though your arguments are set forth very fully and as you see it very clearly, I still have misgivings as to the wisdom of the adoption of this item to the appropriation bill; and in that position I want to go on record as being more than willing, indeed anxious, to support every suggestion or intimation that President-elect Hoover may make for the strengthening and enforcement of the eighteenth amendment; and in that connection may I say that I have great confidence personally in what he may desire to do as well as what he may do in that connection. However, as it appeals to me now, it will be unwise to adopt this amendment until a suggestion is given by Mr. Hoover concerning the same.

Congress is going into special session within less than 60 days probably. When it meets in special session he will be President and there will be an overwhelming majority on both sides of the Capitol to carry out quickly and thoroughly his wishes. Until he has spoken I feel it will be unwise to put this amount of money at his disposal.

In the second place, I question very seriously the motive behind the original proposal for such legislation.

In the third place, until the Customs Service, the border patrol, and the Prohibition Unit patrol system can be unified and their organization under one effective head, the amount of money that we appropriate for the men we employ will go to make mighty little difference as to the effectiveness of enforcement. We need more than money, the enactment of the Stalker bill, and the enactment of a United States border patrol law.

With the best of wishes, I am,
Yours sincerely,

GRANT M. HUDSON.

Yesterday I received the following telegram from the State superintendent of the Michigan Anti-Saloon League:

DETROIT, MICH., January 30, 1929.

I earnestly hope you will support appropriation bill 15848 carrying $24,000,000 additional for prohibition enforcement, but on condition that it be safeguarded by being placed in the hands of President or President and Prohibition Commissioner, to be used as needed for more effective enforcement. I feel certain that I reflect the views and wishes of most of the temperance forces of this State.

R. N. HOLSAPLE.

To which I sent the following reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1929.

Dr. R. N. HOLSAPLE,
McKerchey Building, Detroit, Mich.:

Have publicly announced my intention to vote against Harris amendment. Confident I can justify my position before constituency.

GRANT M. HUDSON.

This question to-day is entirely a political one, with two angles to it—one of a party who desires to emphasize that even though their candidate said he would seek the repeal of the law and went down to defeat on that platform, they still are entitled to a seat among the respectability by fathering this $24,000,000 for law enforcement, even though it is to be used or not to be used; that is of small interest. And the other angle, that they can by its adoption some way embarrass the incoming President, who has plainly stated his splendid position of supporting the eighteenth amendment and its enforcement.

Gentlemen, we have laws enough, regulations enough, money enough to enforce the law if they had strong purpose behind them. Only determination is wanting. Twenty-four million dollars will not put iron in the blood of the enforcing officers. That does not take money; it takes public sentiment. To illustrate how this public opinion can function to the success of halting lawlessness let me read the editorial from one of the dailies of my city:

LAW ENFORCEMENT IS SHOWN

Those who believe in law enforcement, and there are many such, have suffered rebuff of their demands by the claim from some great centers that law can not be enforced. Indeed, the showing has been such that there seemed weight to the contention.

But now here comes both New York and Chicago putting on the most drastic law-enforcement campaign in years, and it appears to be getting results. It begins to appear to those looking on from the outside that the condition in both the cities came to such a pass that it could not be tolerated, even by those who have previously winked at the situation, and now a thorough going clean-up program is on.

In Chicago the readers remember that on a day early this week some 3,394 criminal suspects were rounded up summarily. Even the right of habeas corpus appears to have been in some measure suspended. So quickly were the undesirables apprehended that it seems highly evident that the police of Chicago know exactly where to place their hands on those wanted. If they can do it one time, it can be done another.

The drastic clean-up in Chicago is in some measure the result of what has been going on in New York. How the campaign in the eastern metropolis was instigated by public demand, following the murder of a prominent gambler, has already been told in these columns. An unpretentious citizen might have been slain and the fact would hardly have been noticed, but the slaying of the picturesque Rothstein made newspaper copy. Mystery added to public interest until the whole city was agog over the crime. It became evident to the public that there was some species of police connivance in high quarters and the demand that something be done became political. Even Tammany meets the demands of an aroused public. So the crooks have been driven from New York, only to head for Chicago. * * * Both cities are demonstrating what can be done if there is a will to do it.

However, let me call the attention of the House to the fact that the amendment to the deficiency bill as it now lies before us does not do what even a sincere friend of the amendment might wish it to do.

Secretary Mellon in a letter to the Appropriations Committee of the House calls attention to that fact. I quote him as carried in the morning press:

It is my understanding—

The Secretary wrote—

that in order to make prohibition enforcement more effective the Senate intended to provide additional funds for certain purposes, such as the relief of congestion in the courts; increasing the fleet, equipment, and personnel of the Coast Guard; increasing the effectiveness of the Customs Service, including the border patrol; and increasing the personnel of the Bureau of Prohibition and the Department of Justice; and that inasmuch as it was impossible definitely to allocate the sums to be spent for certain specified purposes at this time, the additional funds provided were to be allocated as the President, in his discretion, might decide.

I feel that it is my duty to point out to you that an examination of the amendment reveals that it will not accomplish the purposes intended. The appropriation will not be available for any of the purposes above enumerated, except increasing the personnel of the Bureau of Prohibition and the Department of Justice, nor will it be available for the conduct of an educational program which may have been contemplated.

The amendment as adopted provides funds for increasing the enforcement force. Granting that the language should be construed most liberally and in the light of the desired ends which the Senate was seeking to accomplish, I fear that the appropriation would not be available for more than an increased personnel.

This being true, an examination of the amendment clearly reveals the Secretary's contention. I shall, if the rule is defeated to-day, immediately seek recognition to offer the following substitute for the amendment:

For the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, the national prohibition act and supplemental acts, the tariff acts, and all laws pertaining to the traffic in intoxicating liquors and narcotics, the sum of $24,000,000, or such portion thereof as the President may deem useful, to be expended in the discretion of the President through the Department of Justice, Coast Guard, Customs Bureau, and Prohibition Bureau; and he may allot a sufficient sum or amount to the Civil Service Commission for the examination and investigation of eligibles for employment in the enforcement of such laws in the various agencies above mentioned in accordance with existing law, and to remain available until June 30, 1930.

Now, Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, it is useless for such denunciation of men or organizations as are indulged in to-day. There are no finer groups of men or women in the world as a whole than the men and women who are working in the temperance organizations of this country. There may be and there are some on the official staff of those organizations who lose the vision of great service and ethical living, but that is true in all stratas of human life and endeavor.

I repeat, as a whole, they are characters of worth and their service ot the Nation is constructive and faithful.

Nor is it worth while to designate the men in our enforcing groups "snoopers, sneaks, and so forth." Again, while there are those who violate their oath and forget their purpose of service, thousands of these men are giving faithful, honest, and efficient service and that, too, in the face of almost without exception inadequate recompense. This service they render while in constant danger from the most dangerous class of law violators the Nation has ever known.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the rule referring this matter to the conference committee realizing that there will be those without doubt as members of the conference who are leaders, recognized not only on this floor and in this body but throughout their State and Nation, in this matter of prohibition and law enforcement, and I am confident that their attitude as conferees will reflect a majority sentiment of the dry membership of this House.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, my attitude on the question of prohibition is, I believe, well known, not only to the Members of this House but to my constituents as well. As one who conscientiously believes in personal liberty, I advocaed during my last two campaigns for office a modification of the Volstead law, and since I have been a member of this distinguished body I have continued my efforts in that direction, believing such action would at least partially restore to the citizens of this country their inalienable rights guaranteed them under the Constitution and would eventually eliminate the corrupt conditions now existing in practically every city, town, village, and hamlet within the boundaries of this great Nation.

It is my opinion that no law can be enforced unless it have the popular will of a majority of the people no matter what amount of money is appropriated or in whose hands the execution of the same is intrusted, especially when the appropriation is not asked for by the officials charged with the administration of such law.

The President has expressed his opposition to the $24,000,000 item for the reason it would conflict with his economy program. The Secretary of the Treasury has seen the futility of such an appropriation and has publicly denounced it on the excuse it is not needed. Doctor Doran, the Federal Commissioner for Prohibition, himself says that the great cause is in such a fix now that it would require a yearly appropriation of $300,000,000 and the establishment of a new and nation-wide system of Federal judiciary to enforce the Volstead Act. For five years every competent prohibition official in the service of the Government has declared that the annual appropriation is ridiculously inadequate and that instead of $30,000,000 a year $300,000,000 would be a more realistic estimate. What is the attitude of the aforementioned Government officials charged with the administration of the provisions of this ridiculous law, I ask? They seem to have a varied difference of opinion as to just what is needed to adequately care for the situation, and are, more or less, hiding behind a smoke screen. The facts are that all deep-thinking and fair-minded people of this country do not want this law enforced, and those intrusted with its execution are only lukewarm toward it. In view of this situation it is very evident that an appropriation of $24,000,000 will not materially relieve the outrageous conditions that confront us to-day.

I am, therefore, opposed to the Senate amendment to the deficiency bill for the reason: First, it would be a useless expenditure of the taxpayers' money; and, second, it has been encouraged and abetted by the members of the Anti-Saloon League, Bishop Cannon, Scott McBride, and others connected with the dry movement. These principal agencies of political activity on the part of the churches are:

The Federal Council of Churches, representing 28 denominations with 23,000,000 communicants, which specializes in pacifistic propaganda in opposition to military training and in lobbying against strengthening the Army and Navy.

The national conference of organizations supporting the eighteenth amendment, the recent amalgamation of 33 societies devoted primarily to maintaining and strengthening the national prohibition law.

The Methodist Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals, an aggressive and influential propaganda and lobbying agency in the interest of prohibition and suppression of vice.

The Anti-Saloon League of America, the political machine functioning at the National and 48 State Capitals through which the churches brought about national prohibition and are now safeguarding the institution from modification.

The Church Peace Union and its subsidiary, the World Alliance for International Friendship through the Churches, another agency of the Protestant denominations for pacifistic propaganda.

These organizations alone expend more than $2,500,000 a year in their activities, while a multitude of affiliated organizations expend as much more.

With these various agencies organized as departments of their political activity, the churches are aiming to reduce the amount expended on national defense and to increase the amount devoted to the enforcement of prohibition. Millions for prohibition but not one cent for cruisers represents the attitude of the church lobby on the pending proposals to increase appropriations for prohibition enforcement by $24,000,000.

Through this appropriation these leaders of the so-called dry movement would expect to be called upon to suggest law-enforcement officers in sympathy with their motives to be placed on the pay rolls of the Prohibition Department. The statement was made on the floor of the House that only 60 per cent of the present force of over 2,000 field officers have been appointed pursuant to the civil service act applicable to the Bureau of Prohibition. Informal advices received from the Civil Service Commission indicate the examination recently held to determine eligibles for appointment as agents under the Prohibition Department will not be completed for a year or more. Therefore what are we to assume? That the remaining 40 per cent of vacancies are to remain vacant during this period or are temporary appointments to be made, thus enabling this organization to wield its influence in such a manner as to control these appointees.

I have heard it said repeatedly that the actions of the Anti-Saloon League could easily be likened to those of the gunman who meets a law-abiding citizen on the street, sticks a revolver to his head, and relieves him of his possessions. The only difference is, a gunman takes a chance with his own life, while these individuals are extracting money from the taxpayers without danger to themselves, under the guise of better civic government for the country.

Reference has been made to the last presidential election and the Members of the House have been admonished to keep faith with the American people. The statement was made that something like 15 per cent of the electoral vote of the last election has been interpreted by some as a wet vote and something like 85 per cent as a dry vote. Let me point out that scores of editorials from leading papers all over the country show that prohibition was defeated in the only two States having a chance to vote on it—Montana by 10,000, which gave Mr. Hoover about 26,000 majority, and Massachusetts by 250,000, which only gave former Governor Smith a majority of about 21,000. A complete analysis of the vote in the recent election will show that former Governor Smith received at least 3,500,000 more votes than he would have received if he had not favored modification.

I contend, therefore, the only real and logical way to enforce prohibition is to meet the will of the people and repeal the law now in force. The fanatics of Volsteadism uplift their hands in assumed holy horror. But I believe that the right of repeal is as sacred as the right of enactment. The organization of citizens for the purpose of bringing about, by legal means, the modification or repeal of any law which those citizens consider unwise or unenforceable I submit is commendable. It is the right of the free citizen to advocate the enactment of any law based on elementary morality, or the repeal or modification of any existing law, and to associate himself with others in that effort. It is also the right of the people to organize to oppose any law and any part of the Constitution with which they are not in sympathy. That is the very base of free speech and of our constitutional guaranties.

Let us then face the facts as we have them. Experience has taught us during the past few years that the prohibition movement is not in sympathy with the will of the people. The only alternative, then, is to relieve ourselves of that evil. Let us clean the slate. Repeal the eighteenth amendment and its accompanying act, and create new legislation that shall blot out utterly, for the welfare of our Government and of all our people, the terrors of prohibition. Let us have absolute repeal.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, while there is nothing new in the arguments heard in connection with the proposed increase in the appropriation for enforcing the prohibition law, as would be effected by the Harris amendment, there is great interest in it. It is of more importance than the casual thinker would at first conclude. It is of interest to all.

It is a matter of general knowledge that those charged with the enforcement of the prohibition law have from time to time given "lack of funds" as an excuse for their failure to more effectively enforce the law. I am not one of those to admit the law is a failure, nor do I admit it is merely an experiment. It was never intended by those of us who framed the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution that it should be a failure or merely an experiment. I assert it is neither a failure nor an experiment. Great progress has been made in the comparatively short time the act has been in force and in it is a moral issue that will not down. Whether wet or dry, all admit the open saloon was an open shame and a menace to our civilization. While conditions are not now as ideal as they should be there is a marked improvement over the old conditions. None of us would turn back to conditions as they were prior to the eighteenth amendment. The most ardent advocate of rum has to admit its harmful effects upon those who use it habitually or to excess.

PEOPLE MUST BE EDUCATED

If prohibition was good and essential during the war, why is it not good and essential in peace time? If it is important to have sober citizens who can think sanely and safely during a period of war, is it not also important that our people be sober and able to think sanely and safely during an era of peace? There is nothing more important to a nation, especially our Nation, than the moral and physical welfare of its people.

No nation is stronger than its citizenship. A sober citizenship is much stronger than a liquor-debauched citizenship, with minds inflamed from the poisons of alcoholic beverages. There is no argument about this. The amendment offered in the Senate by the senior Senator from Georgia, Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS, would give an increase to the prohibition enforcement fund and would place it at the disposal of the President. This fund could be used in many ways to help carry on the important work of law enforcement. It could be used for educational work in educating the people of the Nation as to the harmful effect of strong drink, in building up stronger sentiment for law enforcement generally, and in an effort to build a better citizenship. It could be used to carry messages to the younger generations as to the importance of keeping the mind free from that which depletes the mental and physical being. It could be used to instill a loyal devotion among the old, as well as the young, to the Constitution of the United States. It can not be argued that educational work is not necessary, for only recently a man who was being interrogated in the courts of Washington as to his qualifications to serve on the jury frankly admitted he did not know there was any such thing as a prohibition law in the United States and admitted he had no knowledge whatever of what the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution is. In fact, I doubt if he knows that there is a Constitution at all. He is not alone in this. There are many others throughout the land who are as ignorant on it as he is. The light should be carried to them. A great many people violate the law through ignorance, while many violate it for the money they get out of it. One thing certain, there would be no sales if there were no consumers or buyers. When the people are educated, through temperance, when they fully realize the harm they do in helping some one else violate the law, there will be less drinking; and when the people know, especially the reckless young people, that they are harming and destroying themselves, as well as tearing the heartstrings of their parents and doing great harm to human society and to our Government, there will be still less drinking.

It has been said, and I expect with considerable force, that prohibition came at least 15 to 25 years sooner than it would have otherwise arrived through the temperance teachings that were being carried on. That it would have come sooner or later, despite the eighteenth amendment, there is no question. It was precipitated through war conditions that arose. Drinking was growing less each year. The good women and the temperance leaders were making great progress, and the harmfulness of strong drink was being stressed everywhere and many people were refraining from strong drink because they had learned it was bad for them.

CRIME MUST BE PUT DOWN

It is vital to the welfare of this Republic that its laws be respected and enforced. To admit that we can not enforce our laws is to admit a weakness that will destroy our Government, if it is true.

The prohibition question has never been a partisan question. It ought never to be a partisan question. It is a moral question. Some say it can not be enforced because it has not sufficient sentiment behind it. That is just the purpose of the amendment offered by Senator HARRIS, who is one of the outstanding drys of the Nation, to enable those charged with law enforcement to build up a healthy sentiment that will not only stand against law violations but will stand like a stone wall on all issues that make for the best interest and the substantial moral welfare of our Republic. Sentiment is swinging more and more to respect for law and for law enforcement. People of sound thought, regardless of their views on the prohibition question as an issue to itself, are coming to the view that a more wholesome respect for law and for law enforcement must be built up. If we fail to enforce one law how long do you think it would be before highwaymen would be trying to break down the laws with respect to robbery? How long would it be before the world-wide monopoly, that fosters narcotic sales, would start the cry that a man has the right to buy and use narcotics, and how long would it be before sentiment is undermined with respect to that important law? No sane man who is a "dope fiend" wants to see his child develop into one. No drunkard wants his son to follow in his footsteps.

We must do the best we know, not for the present generation alone, but for generations yet unborn, and we must take a stand, as good citizens, on these moral questions as they arise. The milldam that holds back a great pond of water is strong and a thing to be admired, as it performs its useful purpose, yet if a little place is weakened and a trickle starts over it, a washing away and a weakening will take place, as it grows larger and larger, until a great wide break in the dam occurs. Then it is impossible to stop the flow. Our laws are a great bulwark. They can be likened to the strong milldam. Our laws hold back and prevent a great lot of crime. If permitted to be washed away with maudlin arguments about "personal liberty" and the like, the crime wave will become so large that it can not be controlled. The law has ever been the bulwark of our liberties. Our liberties are not lost because of law, but to the contrary, they are protected and guaranteed to us through and by law. The administration of the law, as to all classes, as to the rich and the poor, without favor or affection, should be enforced with equal justice and impartiality to all.

Dr. F. Scott McBride as well as Bishop Cannon have been misrepresented in the debate that has taken place on this question, and in fairness to Doctor McBride, I am inserting his statement in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, giving his position with respect to this amendment. Bishop Cannon's position is very much like that of Doctor McBride's.

The statement is as follows:

STATEMENT BY DR. F. SCOTT M'BRIDE, GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE OF AMERICA, WASHINGTON, D. C., ON THE $24,000,000 APPROPRIATION FOR PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

I heartily approve of the appropriation of the fund passed by the Senate and the placing of this fund at the call of the President, to be allocated through the different departments having to do with prohibition enforcement. This can safely be used under a budget by the departments.

Following the dry victories of the recent election, it was a foregone conclusion that the dry Congress would give the President, who carries the responsibility for enforcement, what funds were necessary to aid him in the enforcement of the prohibition law.

In the very beginning of this discussion I publicly stated that the fund proposed should be accepted under a carefully prepared budget presented by the department. Later I called attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had not in his letter refused the appropriation, and that he had well said that some of the funds should be used in the Justice Department to give better court service; that other phases of the work he mentioned should be speeded up; and suggested that he go over the work and present a more intensive budget as a proper procedure.

I have never nor do I now favor making so large an appropriation to any one department, to be expended by that department head without a budget. That would be poor business. There can not, it seems to me, be any just objection to placing this fund at the call of the President, to be directed by him to the different departments having to do with prohibition enforcement. The amendment to the Harris amendment to this effect removes what legitimate objections there were to the original statement.

While the apparent politics involved prevented some of the leading drys from voting for the appropriation in the Senate, yet it need not do so in the House and in committee. The House, I think, should concur in the appropriation.

EVERY WET AGAINST AMENDMENT

As proof that my position is correct in this matter, aside from the dictates of my own conscience as to what is right, I assert, without fear of truthful contradiction, that every wet Democrat and every wet Republican, with the possible exception of one, and there are many wets in this House, voted against the amendment that gives the increased appropriation for dry-law enforcement. Now, why is this? Why are the wets all against it? The vote was not on the amendment itself but on the gag rule the Republican Rules Committee brought in here with which to avoid a vote on the question. Many have taken refuge behind this rule as a blind, but the question is, Will the people not peep behind the blind?

A STRONG APPEAL

The liquor forces are ever alert and active. Every method is being used that can be commanded by them to discredit temperance and prohibition. Many drys have been misled into voting against the Harris dry amendment because they say it costs too much. If prohibition can be enforced and established in theory and practice in the United States, its value to this Republic and the world can never be measured in dollars and cents. It will be worth all that it may cost.

I have a letter inclosing a resolution adopted by the College of Bishops of the Methodist Church South, which is a great body of good men, making a strong appeal, and, as a part of my remarks, I am inserting it in the RECORD, because it is along the right line and should be read far and wide. It is as follows:

BOARD OF TEMPERANCE AND SOCIAL SERVICE,
METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1929.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We are inclosing copy of action taken by the College of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Memphis, Tenn., on January 1, 1929.

Cordially,

JAMES CANNON, Jr., President.
EUGENE L. CRAWFORD, Secretary.

MESSAGE TO THE CHURCH

We would bring to our people another exceedingly important matter. The people of the United States have by the method prescribed in the Constitution branded the traffic in intoxicants as criminal. Therefore we would strongly emphasize that while effective enforcement of the eighteenth amendment at whatever expense of men and money must be the persistent aim of the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of both Federal and State Governments, it is the unquestionable duty of all patriotic citizens, and especially of all affiliated with the churches, to be exceedingly scrupulous in their personal observance of the prohibition law.

We call upon our Christian citizenship to give hearty, active, and continuous support to all proper methods and agencies to promote total abstinence and prohibition observance. We urge our pastors, Sunday school, and social workers to adopt and put into effect an adequate educative program to develop a steady growth of public sentiment in behalf of temperance and the observance of the prohibition laws among all our people. It is a significant and important fact that the bootlegger can be quickly put out of business when all the people of reputable standing cease to patronize him.

We also most respectfully and earnestly appeal to the secular press of our country—daily, weekly, and monthly—that it emphasize more frequently the good results which do and would follow the acceptance and observance of the prohibition law, which law is fundamentally simply an effort of organized society—that is, the State—to protect itself and to promote the general welfare by the restriction of the admittedly unnecessary and frequently hurtful indulgence of the appetite of the individual citizen. Furthermore, as nearly all the countries in the world are now grappling with the same evils which are inherent in the traffic in alcohol, it is vital that our own country should make effective the law which it has adopted after so many years of experiment and labor.

W. A. Candler, Collins Denny, Edwin D. Mouzon, John M. Moore, W. F. McMurry, U. V. W. Darlington, H. M. DuBose, W. N. Ainsworth, James Cannon, jr., W. B. Beauchamp, Sam R. Hay, Hoyt M. Dobbs, and H. A. Boaz.

AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS MUST BE PRESERVED

Some assert that the wave of lawlessness and the disrespect for law is the outcropping of lawless elements that have slipped into this country from other lands. It is not all due to that cause. We find far too many of our native stock as defendants in the criminal courts. Far too many American youths are developing into criminals. The home training is lacking, I fear, in many cases. It is a matter of serious concern, and men who think soberly are trying to find the real cause. Whatever it may be, it should be remedied. Too many people from good families are in the chain gangs and penitentiaries of this country. There must be a check to crime, and the check in some measure can be effected in the way these good bishops have indicated. A healthy sentiment for law and order must be built up and maintained. Every good citizen should do his part. The welfare of our Republic and our liberties are at stake. The immigration laws should be tightened up and everything else done that needs to be done to check the rising tide of crime that is sweeping the country. The prohibition law is not the only one being violated. It is not the cause of the crime wave either as some utterly thoughtless and reckless wets would have us believe. But for the prohibition law no one can even surmise how serious conditions would have been during this inexplainable crime wave. It is safe to say conditions would have been many times worse than they are. Regardless of the cost, this crime wave must be ended. I think much of it can be cured in the homes and the schools.

The mothers of the land, always powerful in their Godly influence, should bend their efforts as never before in the making of better men and women of their sons and daughters, and all of us should lend a helping hand in this work that is so vital to our country.

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I followed with keen interest the debate in the Congress upon the amendment made by Senator HARRIS to the deficiency appropriation bill, said amendment providing for $24,000,000 to enable the President to determine methods for the enforcement of prohibition.

The majority party in the House decry this move as a Democratic move to rehabilitate Democrats who lost in the last election with their party again. Still the Republicans pose as the dry party now, just as they did in the election which has passed into history.

Had prohibition been the sole issue in the campaign now history, in my opinion, a somewhat different verdict would have been rendered. In much of the country the issue spoken aloud was prohibition, but the issue whispered was religion, and that un-American spirit, coming from people whose intelligence as to the knowledge of what constitutes a Christian and the doctrine of religious freedom in America was prejudiced, had a very telling effect upon the election in the interest of the Republican nominee.

Let us study the question of prohibition as to honest, impartial enforcement of the present law, and in so doing the conclusion must be that from the conditions existing in the Nation that the administration of the same is either incompetent or corrupt.

There should be some method vigorously put in force by investigation by some committee with sufficient funds and power to determine impartially what is wrong. That failure exists in many cities and other localities, where either there is no real effort at enforcement or the question of politics is a controlling factor, is apparent.

The enforcement of prohibition by an orderly and intelligent method would, if the same can be accomplished, be one of the greatest blessings that could come to humanity.

This not only applies to the United States but likewise applies to all other countries where alcoholic liquor is manufactured and used as a beverage. In my opinion, in order that this be brought about we must again go back to the educational feature which was dropped and the law of force started and now by corruption many of the officers of the law have been debased through the ill-gained money of the bootlegger until a considerable percentage of the Nation has become violators of the law.

The corrupt ring of bootleggers in every city in the United States at this time is an example of the manner in which prohibition has been enforced. The argument of those in power, and under whose control the enforcement is delegated, is that there is no proper program whereby this money can properly be expended successfully. The answer is—what has the party in power been doing during the eight years that it has been charged with this enforcement? What has the Secretary of the Treasury been doing in his organization of the Prohibition Unit? If he has not mapped out a program in eight years, and he is to be continued under the incoming President for four years more, surely unless the necessary funds are supplied the President-to-be after March 4 so that he can plan a program of enforcement, there must be admission by the party that now controls the reins of Government that prohibition is a political blind behind which they can hide and still win by a subterfuge and deception of the citizenship of the country.

It is admitted by the Secretary of the Treasury that there is great congestion in the courts on account of the vast amount of prohibition cases pending. This indicates that violations are becoming so numerous that many new courts must be established to handle the violations, which means additional judges and prosecutors. It would appear reasonable then that funds are needed, and needed badly, in order that we have a temperate Nation which our intelligence should justify.

The conditions existing justify Congress in thoroughly investigating prohibition enforcement in the Nation at this time, and placing the blame where it belongs, for the lack of law enforcement.

That existing conditions must call for drastic and unwarranted legislation, such as is demanded in the State of Michigan, which has become the most rabid State in its laws for violation of the eighteenth amendment, is deplorable. That State is demanding a penalty for violation of the liquor law of a sentence to the penitentiary for life; such legislation now is strongly opposed by the Republican governor, and he is threatening to veto the act if it is passed. This same State sent a poor, ignorant woman to the penitentiary for life for a third conviction. It is my belief that just such arbitrary, drastic, cruel power is what will cause the public to lose confidence in the purposes of the law. I want to say that I am a believer in the education of our people to the need of temperance in the Nation. Let us examine the thought of some of the real students of prohibition, and likewise note the faulty and wrong spirit prohibition has brought to the people of our country.

The head of the National United Committee for Law Enforcement says:

> The liquor law is being nullified from one ocean to another * * * homes are being converted into stills and wildcat breweries; stores of every variety are being camouflaged into places of distribution as substitute saloons. * * * And yet, while America burns with alcoholic eruptions and the handwriting flashes on the wall, Congress fiddles and splits hairs over a penny-ante appropriation in defense of the Constitution.

That same committee sends an "emergency message to the House," and states in part:

> A MANDATE TO ENFORCE
> The country has spoken in emphatic terms on the issue of prohibition. It selected a candidate committed by platform and speech of acceptance to the effective enforcement of the eighteenth amendment by approximately 7,000,000 majority.
> The verdict of the people should be binding upon Congress as well as the President. The President has made known his policy of a fact-finding investigation and enforcement and ought to have the support of every patriot in Congress and out, until the prohibition policy has had a fair and impartial trial. For this reason we stand committed to hold up the hands of the President elect, and believe that he should have at his disposal, upon induction into office, a sufficient sum of money or "such part thereof as the President may deem useful * * * to be allocated as he may see fit."
> If such fund is not provided by the present short session, under the projected plans for an extra session, funds for the scientific investigation and enforcement of prohibition favored by the President elect will not be available for months to come, as there would be no machinery to appropriate such money.
> We are sure that the House would not wish thus to hamstring and hobble President Hoover. For this reason we favor the bill with one important and vital change.

Thus, when it is claimed by many writers and men who have studied the prohibition question that the use and sale of alcoholic and bootleg liquor is being used to-day in a greater amount than during any period since the enactment of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act, and that criminals are being created by the sale of bootleg liquor, it is time that definite action be taken.

When those who supported the Republican candidate for President are claiming that an unprecedented victory was won on the prohibition issue, it would appear to me that the amendment should be adopted, which places in the hands of the President sufficient funds for the carrying forward of the enforcement of prohibition, if it can be enforced, and which gives him full discretion to plan a program for such enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

FEDERAL PENAL AND REFORMATORY INSTITUTIONS

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the special committee which was appointed to make a survey and investigation of all of our Federal penal institutions to present its report to Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio presents a report, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. COOPER of Ohio submitted a report from the Special Committee on Federal Penal and Reformatory Institutions.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I would like permission to have the report which I just sent to the Clerk's desk printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the report referred to may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire as to how many pages are in the report?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Only eight pages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report referred to follows:

JANUARY 31, 1929.

Hon. NICHOLAS J. LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.:

The following report of the committee appointed pursuant to House Resolution 233, Seventieth Congress, first session, is hereby submitted.

Resolution No. 233 reads as follows:

"Resolved, That a special committee is hereby created, to consist of five Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker. Said special committee is authorized and directed to hold hearings and to obtain all available information from dependable sources relative to Federal prisoners confined in Federal, State, county, and municipal prisons and jails; the care of such prisoners as to housing, food, health, recreation, work, discipline, classification, medical treatment, and other pertinent facts; the rates of compensation paid for maintenance and board of such prisoners, the services rendered for such compensation, and the beneficiaries of such compensation; and the need for additional Federal penal and reformatory institutions to take care of the Federal prisoners.

"Said special committee is further authorized and directed to make a survey of the employment of prisoners in the penal and reformatory institutions of the United States and of the several States; to gather information and statistics from reliable sources of the amount and kind of goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, and mined in such institutions; to ascertain to what extent such goods, wares, and merchandise come into competition with goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, and mined by free labor; and to determine how such prisoners can be employed regularly and in what manner the goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, and mined by such prisoners can be best disposed of with the least disadvantage to free labor.

"Said special committee is authorized to sit in Washington or any other convenient place, to administer oaths and affirmations, to send for persons and papers, to employ necessary clerks and stenographers, the latter to be paid at a cost not to exceed 25 cents per 100 words, and said committee shall make a report to the House of Representatives of its findings, conclusions, and recommendations for legislation on or before the first Monday in February, 1929, and may prepare bills to carry out its recommendations for reference to the proper committees of the House of Representatives. The expenses attendant upon the work of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives upon vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by its chairman, but such expenses shall not exceed the sum of $20,000."

In the beginning the committee wishes to express its appreciation for the assistance rendered it in its survey of the situation and its hearings by Capt. A. H. Conner, the superintendent of prisons, and his staff at Washington and at the institutions; by Mr. Herbert D. Brown, Chief of the Bureau of Efficiency, and his organization, including Mr. J. B. Bennett, Dr. Amos W. Butler, and Joseph W. Sanford; by Dr. Hastings H. Hart, consultant in delinquency and penology of the Russell Sage Foundation; and by Maj. Sidney Brewster, assistant to the commissioner of corrections of New York City, and other witnesses who met with the committee at its hearings.

FINDINGS OF THE COMMITTEE

MAGNITUDE OF THE FEDERAL PENAL PROBLEM

Immediately after the committee began its work the magnitude and complicated nature of the problems covered by House Resolution 233 became apparent. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, there was an average daily population of Federal prisoners in the United States of 18,606. For the past 10 years the Federal prison population has increased at an average rate of about 10 per cent a year. Federal prisoners are confined in the three penitentiaries located at Leavenworth, Kans., Atlanta, Ga., and McNeil Island, Puget Sound, Wash. In the penitentiaries are confined most of the Federal prisoners sentenced for more than one year. The United States Industrial Reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio, on the old Camp Sherman military reservation has been established and construction commenced. The Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va., has been completed. About 150 Federal male convicts are assigned to a road camp engaged in construction work at Alderson. Juveniles convicted of violating the Federal penal laws are sent to the National Training School for Boys in the District of Columbia. In addition to the number confined in these institutions, there was, during the fiscal year 1928, an average daily population of 9,658 persons serving short sentences or awaiting trial in some 1,100 State, county, and city jails throughout the country.

The office of the superintendent of prisons in the Department of Justice supervises the care and treatment of all Federal prisoners and is also responsible for the expenditure of over $8,000,000 annually. The maintenance and operation of all these institutions involve perplexing questions not only of physical care and discipline of the inmates but also problems connected with the operation of prison industries and the proper application of the technical sciences of penology and criminology.

The committee believes that the superintendent of prisons and his staff and the wardens and superintendents of the Federal penal and correctional institutions are doing the best they can under the existing circumstances.

CONGESTED CONDITIONS

The committee found that a very serious crisis confronted those who were administering the Federal penal system. Due to the lack of a proper program and to the tremendous increase in the number of persons arrested, convicted, and committed for violations of Federal penal laws, the penitentiaries are overcrowded with those sentenced to prison for more than one year. The committee also observed in all the county and municipal jails it visited that there was overcrowding and idleness. It also has received information which leads it to believe that these same deplorable conditions exist in many of the 1,100 local jails where short-term Federal prisoners are confined. The committee also found that the Federal Government has no power to remedy the conditions in these local jails in which persons convicted of offenses against the United States are confined, and has little or no control over their discipline, employment, or general care.

The committee found that the Leavenworth Penitentiary now has within its walls more than twice the number of prisoners it is able to accommodate. The normal capacity of the Atlanta Penitentiary is 1,712, and upon the day the committee visited it there were 3,107 prisoners in the institution. In both of these institutions there exists the vicious practice of "doubling-up," or placing two prisoners in single cells. Men are sleeping in dark, ill-ventilated basements, and corridors; improvised dormitories are in use; the kitchen and mess facilities are overloaded to more than twice their proper capacity. Not only do these institutions house more than can properly be accommodated but they have now almost reached their absolute physical capacity, and the committee does not see how any further prisoners can be jammed within their walls. The committee also found that no more prisoners should be confined in the McNeil Island Penitentiary, not only because it has reached its proper physical capacity but also because of the remoteness of its location in one corner of the country, far from the center of commitments, and because of the impossibility of securing sufficient fresh water. Only at the new Federal Industrial Institution for Women at Alderson, W. Va., did the committee find sufficient facilities for the proper care of the Federal prisoners committed to that institution. Temporary structures are being used to house Federal prisoners sent to Chillicothe, Ohio, pending the carrying out of a permanent building program. This program has been authorized by Congress and partly appropriated for. The work on this should go forward as rapidly as possible, and Congress should see that the funds are available for this purpose.

EMPLOYMENT OF FEDERAL PRISONERS

About 850 out of the average daily population of 3,149 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, at the Atlanta Penitentiary are employed in the fabrication of canvas duck and the manufacture of canvas baskets for the Post Office Department. There are a considerable number of the inmates who are engaged in the maintenance and operation of the institution and about 200 are employed on the farm, but hundreds of the prisoners at Atlanta are in idleness or semi-idleness.

The only industrial activity at the Leavenworth Penitentiary consists of shops to manufacture shoes, brooms, and brushes for the Indian Service and certain other Government departments and for the inmates of the Federal penal institutions. At Leavenworth most of the prisoners are employed part time, but there is insufficient work to keep the prisoners properly engaged during ordinary working hours.

CONDITIONS IN NONFEDERAL INSTITUTIONS

Persons convicted or held for violations of United States statutes are committed not only to the Federal penitentiaries previously mentioned but are also sent to county and municipal jails, workhouses, and lockups. A few are boarded by the Federal Government in State institutions willing to accept them. In some non-Federal institutions, especially many county and city jails, the conditions are most deplorable. Many of these jails are congested just as badly as are the Federal penitentiaries at Leavenworth and Atlanta, and in most of these jails there is no provision for employing the prisoners. There is in many places no separation of the guilty from the innocent, the sick from the well, the young from the old, or the hardened criminals from impressionable first offenders. Federal prisoners are simply boarders in penal institutions and jails which are not subject to any but informal control of the Federal prison authorities. Therefore the Federal prison authorities have been powerless to remedy the conditions affecting these prisoners and persons held awaiting trial or as witnesses. The committee found that the Department of Justice pays rates of compensation for the board and maintenance of these prisoners varying from 20 cents to $1.25 a day.

USE OF PRISON-MADE GOODS

The law prohibits goods, wares, and merchandise made in Federal prisons from being sold on the open market. Goods produced in the Federal institutions must be disposed of only to the Federal Government and thus only come into indirect competition with free labor and private industry. The committee did not attempt to make any survey of the employment of prisoners in non-Federal prisons and the disposition of goods produced by such prisoners, because it felt that full information on this subject was obtained in connection with the hearings of the Committee on Labor of the House of Representatives on the Cooper bill, H. R. 7729, which divests prison-made goods, wares, and merchandise of their interstate character.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Congestion in the Federal penitentiaries and other institutions in which Federal prisoners are held makes it impossible to develop, under existing conditions, a satisfactory method of housing, segregating, classifying, employing, or properly caring for Federal prisoners. It is the judgment of the committee that none of these other problems can be adequately solved until the existing congestion in the institutions can be relieved, and, therefore, the committee considered it of primary importance to secure information as to how this gross overcrowding can be quickest and best remedied.

1. Administration of prison system: For the first hundred years following the establishment of the Federal Government little concern was felt for the relatively few persons who were convicted of violation of Federal statutes. They were boarded in local jails and State prisons with only nominal and incidental supervision by the Federal Government. In 1872 jurisdiction over Federal prisoners was transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Justice where it has been since that time. The administration of the prison system has been in that department of the Government which is primarily responsible for the prosecution of law violators and the interpretation of the laws of the Nation. While the Attorney General is now charged with primary responsibility, the superintendent of prisons is actually in charge of Federal prisons and prisoners. The office of the superintendent of prisons is only a small division in the Department of Justice, and this committee recommends that in view of the extent and importance of its work it be made a major bureau in said department and that the superintendent of prisons be given an adequate organization to assist him.

2. Extension of the probation system: The committee has come to the conclusion, after giving the matter very careful thought, that the best method of promptly relieving the deplorable congestion in the Federal penitentiaries and in local jails where Federal prisoners are held would be to extend the Federal probation system. This is also the unanimous judgment of all criminologists and experts who have studied the subject. There are at present only six Federal judicial districts out of a total of 92 in which there are probation officers. In response to a recent questionnaire sent to the United States district judges by the superintendent of prisons' office the judges replied that a large number of persons convicted in their courts for violation of Federal statutes and now in various institutions might have been placed upon probation had they the means and personnel to investigate their character and trustworthiness. The actual out-of-pocket cost of maintaining Federal prisoners is about 83 cents a day at the present time. If the probation system had been in operation and these men placed on probation instead of being sent to prison there would have been a large saving in the cost of maintaining Federal prisoners in penitentiaries and jails. This would also have been a great benefit to society as a very large number of these men would be rehabilitated under the probation system. The committee believes that Congress should immediately provide funds to pay the salaries and expenses of probation officers as fast as they can be properly selected. The committee also believes that in view of the fact that these probation officers are selected by the Federal judges and act as personal advisors to the courts in matters of the greatest importance and the highest confidence, it would be advisable to give the judges the power to appoint such probation officers outside the civil-service limitations.

In this connection the committee believes that the entire Federal parole system should be altered. At the present time the law provides that the parole boards shall be composed of the superintendent of prisons, the penitentiary warden, and prison physician. This is an unfair and unwise burden to place upon these officials. Practically all of the States have established independent parole boards, relieving the wardens and local physicians from service upon such boards and the committee believes that a law should be enacted by Congress establishing such a board and giving it full authority to act on parole applications without requiring the approval of the Attorney General.

3. District of Columbia prisoners: At the time the Federal penitentiaries were visited by the committee there were 473 prisoners in the Atlanta and Leavenworth Penitentiaries committed from the District of Columbia for violations of strictly District of Columbia penal laws. These prisoners were sent to the already congested Federal penitentiaries because the District of Columbia prison authorities were unable to take care of them at the District Reformatory at Lorton, Va., where there is no walled inclosure or other sufficient facility to hold desperate prisoners. The committee understands that the District of Columbia has established a reformatory without the physical restraints and bars against escape usually found in penitentiaries and the Lorton reformatory is being developed along these lines. While this may be a desirable goal the committee is of the opinion that the District of Columbia should be required to provide adequate facilities to take care of all classes of its prisoners.

4. Military prisoners: There are at present confined in the Federal penitentiaries 177 military prisoners. When the committee visited Leavenworth it inspected not only the civil penitentiary but also the United States military barracks located only a short distance from the penitentiary. It found that there was ample room in these barracks to take care of all military prisoners and the committee recommends that there be transferred immediately to these disciplinary barracks all military prisoners now incarcerated in the civil penitentiaries and that in the future no more military prisoners be accepted in the already overcrowded civil penal institutions. The disciplinary barracks at Leavenworth has ample facilities for segregation and classification of all classes of military prisoners. At the present time the number of military offenders being sent to the military barracks is decreasing, due to a ruling of the War Department that wherever possible soldiers sentenced for minor infractions of the military regulations be confined within the respective corps areas in order to save transportation expenses.

5. Age limits at Chillicothe: The committee believes that it will be helpful in relieving congestion in the Federal penitentiaries and also make it easier to administer the United States Industrial Reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio, if the minimum age limits for admission to that institution be removed. The law at present provides that only prisoners between the ages of 17 and 30 may be admitted to Chillicothe.

6. Narcotic institutions: Congress has passed the Porter bill (H. R. 13645) providing for the establishment of two institutions for the care of persons addicted to the use of habit-forming narcotic drugs. Nearly 30 per cent of the persons in the Federal penal and correctional institutions come within this category, and the establishment of these institutions will offer considerable relief from the existing congestion in the penitentiaries. The committee feels that the need for these institutions is immediate and pressing and that every effort should be made to expedite their establishment.

7. Establishment of road camps: Congress has before it a bill (H. R. 11285) which permits the utilization of the labor of Federal convicts in the construction of roads and other improvements on Federal reservations. If this bill becomes law it will assist in relieving the congestion at the Federal prisons and help in the solution of the employment problem. The committee believes that this bill should be given early consideration.

8. Employment problem in Federal penal institutions: The committee believes that every effort should be made to provide increased opportunity for employment of Federal prisoners.

A start toward providing employment for prisoners has been made at the Leavenworth Penitentiary, where there is a shoe factory and brush and broom factory in operation, and at the Atlanta Penitentiary, where there is a textile mill engaged in making cotton duck for Government mail sacks. At Atlanta there is also a shop where men are employed in making canvas baskets for the Post Office Department.

It is the committee's judgment that immediate steps should be taken to establish additional shops in the penitentiaries and other Federal penal institutions to make additional goods and articles which could be utilized by the United States Government. There is no doubt but that there is an ample market in the Federal Government for a sufficient quantity and variety of goods to keep all Federal prisoners employed.

The law under which the cotton-duck mill was established at Atlanta provides not only that cotton duck but also all of the mail sacks used by the Post Office Department in excess of the quantity being manufactured by the Post Office Department mail-sack shop in the District of Columbia at the time the law was passed be made at the Atlanta Penitentiary. The committee believes that this law should be immediately carried into effect and that there should be no further expansion of the Post Office Department mail-sack shop.

There have been sufficient funds earned by the prison industries at Atlanta to provide the funds for the construction of an additional building at once within the walls of the Atlanta Penitentiary, in which may be housed further employment activities, and the committee recommends that a sufficient amount of this money be made available for this purpose at once. The committee further recommends that necessary legislation be enacted giving the Attorney General general authority to establish additional industries in all of the Federal penal institutions. There will be no need for a separate appropriation for each proposed additional prison industry if the existing working-capital funds and the earnings of the present industries may be utilized by being consolidated into one working-capital fund.

9. Supervision of non-Federal institutions.—During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, there was an average daily population of Federal prisoners in county and local jails and other non-Federal institutions of 9,658, or slightly more than half of the total Federal penal population. In order properly to supervise the care of the Federal prisoners in these non-Federal institutions the committee recommends that the law be amended, making it possible for the classification of these institutions to accord with the services rendered by them to Federal prisoners. Under the present law the Attorney General may pay only for the cost of the actual and necessary subsistence of Federal prisoners in non-Federal penal and correctional institutions, and this law has been construed as preventing the payment for the care and maintenance of Federal prisoners in accordance with the quality and extent of such care and maintenance. This law should be amended accordingly.

The superintendent of prisons' office has only two inspectors to supervise the 1,100 non-Federal institutions in which Federal prisoners are held. Obviously this is an impossible situation and the committee recommends that funds be provided immediately by Congress to pay for a sufficient number of inspectors to inspect regularly all State and local institutions in which Federal prisoners are held, to the end that the Federal prisoners in local jails actually receive the items for which the Federal Government pays, and to assist in raising the existing standards of these institutions.

10. Additional institutions: The committee believes that under no circumstances should the existing Federal penitentiaries at Leavenworth, Atlanta, and McNeil Island be enlarged to accommodate more prisoners, but that as quickly as possible the prison population in Leavenworth and Atlanta be reduced to not more than 2,000 in each prison. Only in this manner can the vicious practice of placing two prisoners in cells designed for one be ended. The committee can not too strongly condemn this practice. The committee believes further that there should be two additional penitentiaries established as soon as possible. One should be in the northeastern part of the country, located as near as possible to the center of commitment from the Federal courts, and the other at such place as a board of experts may determine.

The committee also believes that there should be established a hospital for the care of the criminal insane with 500 beds as a beginning, to which could be transferred the criminal insane now located at St. Elizabeths Hospital in the District of Columbia as well as those prisoners requiring psychopathic treatment now held in the various penal institutions. We also recommend that all prisoners on their admission to Federal institutions be given a psychopathic examination.

The committee also believes that it is necessary to establish in the immediate future jails and workhouses for Federal prisoners in several of the more congested centers of population. The first step in this direction has already been taken, as the Federal Government has been compelled to establish a Federal detention jail in New York City owing to lack of facilities because the New York City authorities are no longer able to provide accommodations.

The committee earnestly urges:

1. That the narcotic institutions already authorized be appropriated for and constructed as rapidly as possible.

2. That two new penitentiaries and a hospital for the criminal insane be authorized as soon as possible.

3. The reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio, should be pushed to completion.

4. That the Federal jails or workhouses to care for short-term and detention prisoners be authorized at New York City, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, and such other places as the need from time to time shall require.

The prison problem is daily becoming more acute and there is an average increase in sentence of prisoners of 10 per cent per year. Even the most prompt building program will have difficulty in keeping up with the prison population. Responsibility for determining the type of institutions to be established, their location, and their priority should be placed squarely upon the executive branch of the Government.

Legislation carrying out the recommendations of this committee, in so far as it is required, will be promptly presented to the Congress, and we urge its immediate passage.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN G. COOPER, Chairman.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read from the desk a statement by myself by way of a supplemental report on the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT BY MR. FRENCH

The House on January 28, 1929, adopted House Resolution No. 278, requiring in connection with a reported bill or joint resolution that the House be advised with respect to any proposition in such measures to repeal or amend any statute or part thereof, the text of the statute or part thereof which is proposed to be repealed, and a clear indication of the respect in which modification is proposed.

The report on the naval bill (H. R. 16714) was sent to the Printing Office on the day House Resolution No. 278 was adopted. Hence, it was not practicable for the committee to comply with the terms of the new resolution in the report.

In compliance with the new rule I submit herewith a statement indicating wherein H. R. 16714, the naval appropriation bill, contrasted with the naval appropriation act for the current fiscal year, changes or modifies existing law, and I ask that the same be printed in the RECORD as part of my report.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what is the report that has just been read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it is a supplemental report on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. FRENCH. It is; and I would like to have printed in parallel columns the proposed change and the law as it now is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to have that printed in the RECORD?

Mr. FRENCH. I desire that it be printed for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the gentleman going to have his bill show those provisions that are not authorized by law, if there be such?

Mr. FRENCH. The matter that I desire to have printed is in compliance with the new rule and will show proposed language in the bill and the language of existing law that may be amended.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman assures us there are no provisions in the bill that are not based upon existing law?

Mr. FRENCH. Not so far as I am aware; the change of language clarifies rather than changes the law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

H. R. 16714	EXISTING LAW
On page 12, lines 3, 4, and 5 the following clause appears, the italicized matter being new: "and for transporting members of such corps to and from camps, ships, or other designated places of instruction."	The Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, established by the act of March 4, 1925 (U. S. C. 1137, sec. 821), requires that it be operated, as far as practicable, in conformity with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps of the Army. Such law (U. S. C. 185, sec. 441) provides that— "The Secretary of War is hereby authorized * * * to transport members of such corps to and from such camps at the expense of the United States so far as appropriations will permit * * *."

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 16724, introduced yesterday and referred to the Judiciary Committee, be rereferred to the Committee on Claims. I have spoken to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], of the Committee on the Judiciary, and that is agreeable to him. There is every reason why the bill should go to the Committee on Claims, because it relates to a series or kind of claims which are regularly coming up one at a time before the Claims Committee, and which the House has uniformly approved, recognizing an obligation to those who were injured in citizens' military training camps and other military camps. This bill provides that all such cases be referred to the United States Employees' Compensation Commission, as are similar claims for injuries at naval training stations under the provisions of the present law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Where does the bill belong under the rules?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. It goes, in the opinion of the parliamentarian, under the rules, to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If it belongs to that committee under the rules——

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. At least it might belong there, at least under one interpretation; and I am trying to state now the reason why the present bill should properly go to the Committee on Claims in this instance. If any member of the Committee on the Judiciary objected, of course, I would not press the request, but I would like to tell why this bill ought to go to the Claims Committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, just the members of the respective committee can not and ought not to determine this matter by agreement among themselves. The whole House is interested, at least theoretically, in the proper reference of bills. If this bill properly belongs, under the rules of the House, to the Judiciary Committee—I know nothing in the world about it myself—but if it properly belongs to the Judiciary Committee, of course, it ought to remain within the jurisdiction of that committee. A change like this, of course, would establish a precedent.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I would not concede that it belongs to the Judiciary Committee, but the parliamentarian thought it did and rather than question that I thought this was the fair way to present the question to the House with the reasons why it ought to go to the Claims Committee. By this course the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee is not questioned and no precedent affecting jurisdiction is set. The Claims Committee is taking up these claims one at a time and it is a waste of the time of both the committee and of the House, since it is the policy of Congress to compensate on the basis of the United States employees' act the young men injured in military and naval training, there seems to be no reason why the cases from the military camps may not be referred directly to the commission as are the naval claims for injuries under a general law..

The Claims Committee is the only committee concerned in the matter practically. It is seeking no new jurisdiction, but rather to repair an inequality or lack of uniformity in the general law which causes it—the Claims Committee—needless work and wastes the time of the House.

I might suggest that the bill with provision for the protection of naval trainees come from either the Appropriations or the Naval Affairs Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that he defer his request until to-morrow as the Chair would like to look into the matter.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I will defer the request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state that the gentleman from Ohio stated he had spoken to me about this matter, which he did, and I stated I had no objection myself, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary; but I was not speaking for the committee itself or for the chairman, but only for myself.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. VINCENT of Iowa, at the request of Mr. KETCHAM, for the day, on account of illness.

Mr. HUGHES, for three days, on account of death in his family.

Mr. KENT, at the request of Mr. BOX, on account of pressing business.

Mr. BOHN, at the request of Mr. MAPES, for five days, on account of important business.

Mr. KUNZ, idefinitely, on account of illness.

Mr. GREGORY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT], who has been called home on account of serious illness in his family.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, granted.

FEDERAL PENAL AND REFORMATORY INSTITUTIONS

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the report just made by the Committee on Penal Institutions.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is it a minority report?

Mr. BOYLAN. No; it is not a minority report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, although the committee did not see fit, for very good reasons, to include the subject I am about to discuss in its formal report, I think it ought to be brought to the attention of the House. I am certain from my discussions with Members of both the committee and the House that they do not approve the placing of "undercover" men in Federal prisons in an effort to spy on the officials and the inmates there. That has been done, as you all know, by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of Federal prisons, Mrs. Mabel Walker Willebrandt.

This action is indefensible on any grounds. I for one can not understand how any high official could conceive of such a practice in the United States. They had such systems in Russia, but even there they have been overthrown. It is certainly contrary to American traditions, the American system of government and administration, and a sense of decency. I do not believe that Mrs. Willebrandt's policy is indorsed by the President or by her immediate superior, Attorney General Sargent. It is my understanding that both of them highly disapprove of such tactics. Certainly the American people do. For if it continues, not only in the administration of prisons but in the enforcement of the prohibition laws, we will become a nation of spies, snoopers, and Benedict Arnolds. The House, I believe, knows the facts in the case. But besides resorting to this despicable system, the official responsible procured false commitment papers from a Federal judge in Detroit. Her action is to be condemned in language too strong for expression, in my opinion. And the only reason I did not insist upon criticism of her conduct in the formal committee report is that I did not want to destroy the value of the truly constructive recommendations which our committee has made in connection with the Federal penal system.

It is almost unnecessary for me to recall this same official's intemperate and un-Christian speeches during the campaign. Taking her pulpit in the churches, where only God's message of brotherly and sisterly love should be spoken, she inflamed the passions of our people, flouted religion itself, and created bitterness which may not subside for a generation. I am willing to forgive and forget, for I believe she knew not what she did in her excess of zeal and excitement, but I regret that such a spectacle should ever have been presented to the American people.

Intemperance, it seems to me, has marked the official conduct of this glowing apostle of prohibition and incarceration of agents provocateur in our Federal prisons. Fanaticism dictated her attempt to use the conspiracy clauses of our Federal laws in prosecution of violators of the Volstead Act in New York City. Like the legislators in Michigan, who send responsible mothers of large families to prison for life if snoopers have caught her with a pint of liquor on her person, Mrs. Willebrandt wanted to fill our unhealthy and overcrowded prisons and jails with hip toters and customers of a speak-easy or two. Thirty days and fines were not enough for her; she wanted her victims to rot and hunger in the dungeons for years. But the juries showed better sense and a better understanding of human nature than she did. They would not convict. And now, after devoting time and expense to this impossible persecution, the Federal Government has been forced to abandon its medieval forms of punishment.

Gentlemen, I regret the necessity of these references, but it is time that somebody called a halt on the headlong rush of certain officials swollen by their power. We are still citizens of a republican form of government. We have not yet surrendered to the Anti-Saloon League or its representatives in office. I predict we never will.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I send to the desk several letters which I have received in relation to the pending cruiser bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WILMINGTON, DEL., January 29, 1929.

Hon. DANIEL O. HASTINGS,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Allow me to enter a protest against the passage of the so-called cruiser bill.

We have now a navy bigger than that of any other nation except England, with which nation we are about on a parity, and with which nation there is not the slightest possibility that we could have a war.

Besides this, after having indorsed the Kellogg peace pact, the passing of the cruiser bill will imply that we are not honest in our desire for peace and make us look ridiculous to the other nations of the world.

Very truly yours,

LEWIS W. BROSIUS.

Senator HASTINGS.

DEAR RESPECTED FRIEND: Will thee kindly use thy influence and vote against the passing of the cruiser bill to build more ships, when we are so hopeful that the Kellogg peace treaty will end all war. It surely is not a sensible thing to build ships for war and send forth the message of peace—that has been such a comfort to the whole world at large—to settle the differences of nations by peaceful methods.

Hoping this will add to the many letters sent thee to do thy duty to God and man.

Very cordially,

ELIZABETH F. NEWLIN.

JANUARY 30, 1929.

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF WILMINGTON
AND THE WILMINGTON EMPLOYEES' ASSOCIATION,
Wilmington, Del., January 30, 1929.

Hon. DANIEL O. HASTINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The Manufacturers' Association of Wilmington, representing 75 per cent of the manufacturers in the State of Delaware, wishes to strongly urge your support of the cruiser bill, H. R. 11526, now before the Senate.

Our Navy, according to the highest authorities, is below parity with all first-class powers and is incapable of adequately performing its functions as our first line of defense and the guardian of our expanding commerce.

President Coolidge, in his last Armistice Day speech, estimated that our unpreparedness for the Great War cost taxpayers $1,000,000,000 for every six days. We, therefore, feel that this is an investment our Government should make, that the time limit specified in the bill should be strictly adhered to and that the wave of pacifism threatening to strip us of all adequate defense should be strongly resisted.

Very truly yours,

HARRY I. BELL, Secretary.

WILMINGTON, DEL., January 31, 1929.

Hon. DANIEL O. HASTINGS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HASTINGS: I sincerely hope you will use your efforts to have the bill authorizing the construction of additional cruisers brought up for a vote in such form that it will not include the time limit requiring all of the construction to be started or completed within the relatively short period talked of.

As a basis to trade with France and England in future negotiations, it may be policy to pass the bill. I feel rather some strong doubts as to whether there is, otherwise, justification for a program of construction of this size at this time, but in any event it would seem a great mistake to require that the entire program be entered upon within the next few years on account of the possibility of future treaties providing for reduction in expensive naval construction.

Yours very respectfully,

J. EDGAR RHOADS.

WILMINGTON, DEL., January 31, 1929.

Hon. DANIEL O. HASTINGS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DAN: You may think it rather peculiar that I, as a Quaker, should be writing to you to ask you to support the cruiser bill now before the Senate, but I feel very deeply on this question and can not agree with those who are making such a great "howl" against it, stating that an adequate navy is an invitation to attack.

To my mind, while these people are thoroughly sincere in their ideas, they are lacking in a knowledge of human nature. When we were boys we had no hesitancy in climbing a fence and going after apples—if we knew that the farmer was on the other side of the farm, and had no dog—whereas, if we knew that he had a good bulldog we walked carefully down the road and did not attempt to climb the fence.

With kindest regards and best wishes, I am,

Yours very sincerely,

JOSEPH BANCROFT.

MEMORIAL TO MAJ. GEN. HENRY A. GREENE

Mr. BINGHAM. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back without amendment, and unanimously, the bill (H. R. 12404) authorizing erection of a memorial to Maj. Gen. Henry A. Greene at Fort Lewis, Wash., and I submit a report (No. 1585) thereon.

Mr. JONES. The bill entails no expense on the Government, but simply permits the erection of this memorial on the Army post grounds at Fort Lewis, where General Greene was commander for a long time. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Henry A. Greene Memorial Association, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Washington, be, and is hereby, authorized to erect and maintain a suitable building, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, in and upon the United States military reservation at Fort Lewis, Wash., the plans of such building to be first approved and the building to be constructed in such location as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the use of such portion of the ground floor of said building as may be necessary shall be given to the Post Office Department of the United States, free of charge, for the post-office service of the reservation, so long as said building remains on said grounds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mr. GREENE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that to-day, February 1, 1929, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 4979) to authorize the city of Niobrara, Nebr., to transfer Niobrara Island to the State of Nebraska.

PREFERENCE FOR DISABLED WAR VETERANS IN CENSUS BUREAU

Mr. ASHURST. I submit a concurrent resolution which I ask may be read.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 35) was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is the sense of Congress that in the selection of such persons as are to be employed without reference to civil service, in the preparation of the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses direct preference shall be given to the disabled veterans of wars in which the United States has been engaged.

Mr. ASHURST. It seems that there is now no committee on the census; hence I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Commerce Committee.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that it accede to the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. KEYES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, on yesterday the House refused to agree to the Senate amendments to the deficiency appropriation bill, in which my amendment relative to prohibition enforcement was included. I shall not criticize anyone's vote or their motives and I shall make no partisan statement. I have consulted both Republican and Democratic Senators supporting this legislation and I have tried to keep partisanship out of the discussion entirely. Nothing I have said could be construed that way. It certainly will not be my fault if this effort to secure appropriation sufficient to enforce the prohibition law is made a partisan question.

But I want to analyze the vote of the House yesterday without reflecting on or criticizing any Member of that body. It shows that the leaders of the majority of the House joined the Tammany Hall Congressmen from New York City, the Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Chicago Congressmen, and the Representatives from the other great wet cities in the country in the other House, who do not believe in the prohibition law or its enforcement.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state the point of order.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Georgia is discussing what took place in another part of the Capitol, and under the rule he is not permitted to do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, several Members of the House in discussing this bill referred to me as its author, and one Member went so far as to criticize my motives in offering the $24,000,000 amendment to enforce prohibition.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have read at the desk an amendment which will be submitted to the conferees by Congressman BYRNS, one of the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the deficiency bill. This amendment is entirely satisfactory to me and those of us in this Chamber who supported my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

For the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment, the national prohibition act and supplemental acts, the tariff acts, and all laws pertaining to the traffic in intoxicating liquors and narcotics, the sum of $24,000,000, or such portion thereof as the President may deem useful, to be expended in the discretion of the President through the Department of Justice, Coast Guard, Customs Bureau, Prohibition Bureau; and he may allot a sufficient sum or amount to the Civil Service Commission for the examination and investigation of eligibles for employment in the enforcement of such laws in the various agencies above mentioned in accordance with existing law, and to remain available until June 30, 1930.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. BYRNS, one of the conferees on the part of the House, will, I have been informed, offer that amendment when the conferees meet. It will meet very largely the objections of the Secretary of the Treasury. Of course, if he is opposed to any enforcement of the prohibition law, then, no matter what we agree to would be acceptable to him. This amendment does not force the spending of $1 extravagantly—only such part as is necessary—and I have faith in President-elect Hoover, who would have charge of this fund under my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not see how it is possible for the conferees to put such an amendment in the deficiency bill. It is entirely different from anything contained in the language of the provision of the House or in the language of the amendment adopted by the Senate. Such a procedure would be not only against the rules of the House but against the rules of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I suggest that other conferees be appointed if the Senate now thinks those already designated are not capable of determining these questions for themselves.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, yesterday we were told, in a very eloquent speech delivered by a distinguished Senator, that those who oppose the time-limit provision in the cruiser bill are advocating a new dispensation on earth; that they think the hearts of men have changed and that no more is there any selfishness in the world. I submit, Mr. President, that some of us, at least, who believe in striking out the time-limit provision as it is now written still believe that there yet remains some selfishness in the world, but at the same time there has been a change in the thoughts and hearts of men affecting the peace of mankind.

There have been times, of course, when wars had to be fought and the people had to be taxed in order to prosecute them; but through the process of time civilization has developed, and I believe that the people of the world to-day are more interested in adopting plans that will preserve the peace of the world than they are in proposals imposing larger expenditures for the preparation of wars; so I expect to show, if I can, that the opposition of some of us to the time-limit provision is based upon reason and practice.

The speech of the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on day before yesterday was most eloquent. He has been most consistent in advocating preparation for war and the maintenance of a very large navy. I recall with pleasure the magnificent fight he waged against the adoption of the Washington conference agreement, and recall the many defects which he pointed out in the understanding then consummated. I recall, too, Mr. President, the long fight made on this side of the aisle in the cause for peace. I would not now detract one iota from the efforts of Democratic leadership in trying to evolve some plan for all the peoples of the world that future wars might be prevented and peace preserved.

It was pointed out in the debates at the time the League of Nations covenant was being discussed here that if we did not become a party to it we would have to go on a war rampage of naval competition. So it does not frighten me at this particular time to see bobbing up once in a while distinguished leaders, not only here but in the newspapers of the country, who opposed a plan of peace at that time and who now criticize as pacifists and poltroons those of us who believe in the elimination of the time limit in this bill. Many of them have been as consistent in opposing proposals of peace as they have been consistent in asking for large expenditures for preparation for war. If this country had exerted as much time and effort in cooperating with other nations to mold some plan, or working with them in some plan, to preserve peace and minimize the likelihood of future wars as it has in trying to find some way to destroy or effect these plans, we would not now be discussing this cruiser proposal. I did not think—and, in my opinion, but a small percentage of the American people thought at the close of the great World War—that we should hear in this body at this early date speeches so militant in character, so eloquent in presentation, that we could almost feel ourselves in the vortex of another war. Following the great World War some of us at least believed that the damage wrought, the suffering inflicted, the economic disarrangement imposed would naturally influence a modification, if not cessation, in another gigantic preparation for another war.

I read with interest the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as he, in that inimitable style of his, pictured the unpreparedness of this country when we entered the World War and how we had a scarcity of airplanes, machine guns, and other implements of war. One reading that speech might think that it was a detraction, in a way, from the great part that we played in that war. I shall not attempt to answer that. The glory of this country is written in the part played not only by the soldiers at the front and the men who manned our guns upon the seas, but by the great civilian population of this country, as well as by the statesmanship which guided the ship of state through those troublesome times.

The part played in that titanic struggle by our men and women in every walk of life will ever remain a great achievement and will reflect a lasting glory upon the country.

We are told that islands are fortified close to us; that Great Britain has a larger number of cruisers than we and has been expending great sums of money in the building of more. Mr. President, I know of no time when our country had a navy that was equal to the navy of Great Britain; nor do I now remember just when those fortifications, which we are told are pointing their guns toward us, were constructed; but, if I recall correctly, they have been there for decades; and yet not for almost 120 years have we engaged in war with Great Britain. And one must stretch his imagination now to believe that there is any likelihood of a war with that great Empire. They have been our allies in times of great moment and for a long time. I hope it will ever continue.

Mr. President, we are also told that the time limit should be placed in this proposed legislation; that it is necessary that it be placed there in order that the cruisers shall be built. I expect to show, before I conclude, that in no other instance where we have authorized the construction of battleships, cruisers, torpedo boats, or what not, has such a provision been inserted in any legislative proposal. Such action would be unprecedented, and the Senators who are leading this fight know that it would be unprecedented; yet, because some of us would eliminate it, we are characterized before the country as pacifists; cartoons are published in the newspapers ridiculing those of us who raise our voices here in the interest of peace, in the interest of economy, and in the interest fo adhering to the long-established customs and precedents governing such legislation as this in the past.

It is said that the Washington disarmament conference was a failure. In many respects it was a failure, but I have not any doubt that the men who represented this Government at that conference did their utmost to accomplish more than they did accomplish. I have not any doubt that they would have been delighted, as I know from reading the record, to have succeeded in the effort they made to have secured a limitation of cruisers and submarines and armament other than battleships; but they failed; they were unable to do it; and just so long as inventions are made and developments are brought about in naval construction and in military armaments or implements of warfare we are going to have naval and military competition. One country will say, "We want so many submarines to perfect our commerce"; another country will say, "We want so many cruisers in order to break blockades, so that we may develop our trade and commerce." One country is willing to make a desired concession to the other country if the other is willing to concede its particular contention; and so the mad race goes on and nothing is accomplished.

I submit, therefore, that we have in the end to get to some plan such as is proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—which I am delighted to see those who direct the destinies of the pending measure accept—that will ultimately bring about a conference that will establish the rules and regulations governing the rights of belligerents and the rights of neutrals. When we shall have done that, we can fix a basis for the limitation of armaments.

I am not frightened by the fact that we have failed in one instance. It is not the first time that a laudable mission which has been embarked upon has failed and then afterwards something has been accomplished. The whole world is full of instances where men have failed the first time to accomplish some achievement upon which they have set out, but on the secord or third or perhaps the seventh attempt have succeeded. Merely because the Washington disarmament conference failed is no reason to suppose that another conference might also fail.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I dislike to hear the Senator say that the Washington disarmament conference failed.

Mr. HARRISON. I did not catch the Senator's remark.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said that the Washington disarmament conference failed. Yet it is admitted that it did reach an agreement as to battleships; and it is likewise admitted that every nation at that conference has abided by the agreement as to battleships. So it seems to me that something was accomplished.

Mr. HARRISON. Something was accomplished.

Mr. NORRIS. If it had not been for the conference, we would probably be in a controversy now about building battleships.

Mr. HARRISON. I repeat, something was accomplished.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. The very Senators who now here in the Senate are proclaiming that the Washington conference was a failure, a year or two ago were pointing to it as one of the greatest achievements of the Republican administration.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; that is true. However, in some particulars it did not obtain everything that those who represented our Government desired. Of course, as the result of that conference we did scrap some battleships. It is variously estimated that the loss to us as a result was about $150,000,000; and I believe the estimate has gone as high as $400,000,000. I do not know the exact figures, for I have never been able to ascertain that there is any real agreement among naval experts as to any particular proposition. As I have read the debates in the House, and as I have read the records and documents available to the Senate, I have found that there is some difference of opinion as to the amount of tonnage and as to the number of ships in the British Navy as compared to ours, and particularly with reference to what are called cruisers. Some tell us that the great number of vessels shown on paper to be possessed by Great Britain are in many instances small cruisers; that they are not as fast moving as ours; that they are not as good as some of the great submarines we have constructed. However, I pass that by. I assume that Great Britain has a larger navy than ours. I wish that we could be placed upon a parity with her some time. I would prefer that it be accomplished, if possible, by the British scrapping hers rather than ours being increased; but if the parity in time can not be achieved in such manner, then we will have to build toward her. But why hasten at this time? What necessity for it? Why the orderly way in which we have proceeded in the past to authorize construction be changed? It does seem to me, in this day of high civilization and broad statesmanship, that the nations could get together and adopt proper rules and regulations touching belligerent and neutral rights upon the seas, that a proper limitation upon armaments could be concluded. And if those high missions can be accomplished, there may be no need for these cruisers being constructed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that only the other day, I think, it was figured out quite definitely that the cost of the ships which we scrapped, together with the cancellation of the contracts, involved about $175,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. It is immaterial, so far as the purpose I now have in mind is concerned, whether the cost was $175,000,000 or $400,000,000.

Mr. HALE. It can be ascertained from an examination of the figures. The work which had been done on these ships which were scrapped cost about $150,000,000, and it cost $25,000,000 additional to settle the contracts which had been entered into.

Mr. HARRISON. Exactly; and the Senator from Maine and those who stand with him now want to see this great Government of ours begin within five months the construction of five cruisers, when they know that a disarmament conference is going to take place in 1931 that might result in scrapping some of the ships which will then be in course of construction, at the same time being forgetful that in this country we are still paying taxes for the burden of war and are suffering from the aftermath of the war.

Mr. HALE. We know, and the Senator himself knows perfectly well, that if the ships provided for by this bill shall be constructed we will not have to scrap them. It is not conceivable that Great Britain will scrap the ships that she has already built.

Mr. HARRISON. That may be; I will accept the advice of the naval expert upon that proposition; but I do know that when the Washington disarmament conference ended we had some battleships being constructed, and they were scrapped, and that act cost the American people a great deal of money. I know, furthermore, that when the war was ended by the treaty of Versailles the German Navy was destroyed. We did not ask to take over the German ships; England did not insist on taking over the German ships; nothing was said as to that, except that the ships should be scrapped. Yet here we are preparing to tax the American people again to build more ships, when we know that a disarmament conference is to meet in 1931, and perhaps another one this or next year.

Mr. HALE. The Senator also knows that the only reason we were able to bring about any agreement at the Washington disarmament conference was on account of the ships that we had building.

Mr. HARRISON. I can not believe that the statesmen of Great Britain were so weak that the reason they accepted a ratio of 5-5-3 with reference to battleships was because we had then some battleships in course of construction. That is the reason now advanced for this particular cruiser bill; that we must have in the yards being constructed some more cruisers in order to bludgeon Great Britain and Japan into limiting the construction of battle cruisers, perhaps.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, Great Britain, as she has a predominant navy, is perfectly satisfied with the status quo. If we are going to get her to cut down, we have got to show that we are going to keep up our Navy, or we will get nowhere in any conference; and if we provide merely for paper ships our "bluff" will be "called."

Mr. HARRISON. Here we are wanting to begin within five months, not willing to wait a year on five of them, not willing to wait two years nor three years, but wanting to begin five of them in four months by the 30th of June of this year, when we read in the papers that already Germany has invented a cruiser with 11-inch guns that can shoot many miles farther than the guns on these cruisers that we are going to construct.

Mr. HALE. What good would that do Germany?

Mr. HARRISON. No good, except that here is one nation in a mad race, in competition with another country, to build a bigger cruiser, a faster cruiser. It may be Great Britain or Japan will invent one more powerful and faster than the German type; then we will have to scrap these and adopt a new type.

Mr. HALE. Under the treaty of Washington such a ship could not be constructed.

Mr. HARRISON. Then those nations not members of the Washington conference have the advantage of us.

Mr. President, I shall not occupy the time of the Senate long, but I feel deeply and in earnest with reference to the time limit in this proposal. I said that it is unprecedented. The other day the Senator from Maine cited me to the law of 1924. We fixed a limit then. I want to read that law.

It will be remembered that in 1916, when war clouds were gathering in every part of the world, when every day we were approaching closer to the vortex of war, when these delicate questions were constantly presenting themselves to the administration, and the President of the United States and the naval board and the military authorities knew we must begin to prepare, and President Wilson went from one end of the country to the other arousing the people to the necessity of it; we needed those things, he said, pretty quickly; and so we passed the naval bill of 1916.

Was a provision written into the law at that time imposing a time limit? Did the law then say that we were to begin in five months the construction of five of the cruisers or five of the battleships? No, Mr. President. In that law we provided for a good deal. We provided for 10 first-class battleships. We provided for 6 battle cruisers. We provided for 10 scout cruisers. We provided for 50 destroyers, for 9 fleet submarines, for 58 coast submarines, for 1 submarine of another type, and for other instruments of war.

It is said that we have done nothing toward preparedness. It is said that we are a weak nation; that other nations have been constructing cruisers and other implements of war while we have sat quiescent and done nothing. That is not true. That was in 1916. In 1924 we came along, under the leadership of the Senator from Maine, and constructed more of these implements of war. At that time we provided for eight of these cruisers. We provided for other implements of war. We have done very well. The big fight on this bill is not against the 15 cruisers, not against giving the President the right to build them, but it is against the provision in regard to beginning upon 5 of them within five months, by the 30th of June of this year, 5 more of them in one year and five months, and 5 more in two years and five months.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that under the 1916 program, which put no time limit on the construction of the vessels authorized, certain vessels were authorized that have not yet been constructed. That is something that the Senate does not want to see happen in regard to these cruisers.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Maine does not recall the facts about that bill. The bill of 1916 provided that the construction of those vessels was to be begun by the President by 1919. He was given three years in which to begin their construction. If the Senator will investigate the law, he will find that that is what it says. The President was given until 1919 to construct them. We hoped that perhaps he would not have to construct them. We gave him the power and the discretion to begin at any time within three years; and in 1918 we wrote a provision in the law also, because at that time some of them had not been constructed, saying that he was to begin as soon as practicable before the expiration of the time fixed in the law of 1916.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to the fact that because of the improvement now over the conditions that existed a few years ago, the very delay that has taken place, and a repetition of which the Senator from Maine says he wants to avoid, will result, when the ships are constructed, in much better and more efficient and more useful ships than though they had been started and completed within a year or so. I call the Senator's attention also to the fact that that delay has not injured us or anybody else one particle.

Mr. HARRISON. Now I want to read, if the Senator will permit me, getting back to this proposition, what happened in 1924. Here is the report of the Senator from Maine in 1924. That law did not provide for beginning construction in a year or two years, nor did it say that five cruisers should be built within five months. The law of 1924 provided that their construction must be started before 1927.

Mr. HALE. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. The President was given three years from 1924.

Mr. HALE. The time limit was set within which they should be constructed.

Mr. HARRISON. Time within which they were to begin construction, and that three years off.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator agree now to write a 3-year provision in this bill?

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President; I will not——

Mr. HARRISON. Of course the Senator will not.

Mr. HALE. Because I think it is a much more orderly procedure to provide for building five each year.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is inaugurating a new system here. All of those who have gone before, in providing for the building of battleships and cruisers, thought it was all right to give the President three years in which to begin construction; but the Senator wants to force his new President to begin on five of them inside of five months.

Here is what the Senator said at that time, in 1924, in his report:

> In view of the above facts, it is the opinion of your committee that the proposed program of eight light cruisers is a very modest one, and that it should be proceeded with as rapidly as practicable. In order to provide for this there has been incorporated in the bill a proviso that all eight vessels be laid down not later than July 1, 1927.

The Senator from Maine had confidence in President Coolidge. He was perfectly willing to give him the discretion of three years in which to build those cruisers. He said their construction must be proceeded with as rapidly as practicable; but to his new President, whom he stood for in Maine, whom he went to the Republican convention and advocated, he is not willing to give the discretion of building these cruisers for the next three years.

Mr. WHEELER. And that notwithstanding the fact that the President elect has said that he wants this time limit eliminated.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Here is a bill that was introduced, carrying out the views of the Naval Board, in 1927. That is this program. Senators will recall that at that time it amounted to a billion dollars. It was so stupendous—it was, I might say, so ridiculous—that it did not even receive the approval of the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate. It did not receive the approval of anybody in the House of Representatives, so far as I know; not even the approval of the Secretary of the Navy—or, if he did approve it, he has kept quiet about it lately—and so they reduced the amount to $740,000,000. I presume, if they had carried through their plan, and if we now had before us the plan of expending $750,000,000, those of us who would say "strike out the time limit" and advocate not starting on the construction of so many of the vessels within five months would be classed as poltroons; we would be held up to the country as pacifists.

What has happened to change those who first suggested the plan of providing for $750,000,000 to the amount now of two hundred and eighty-odd million dollars? Have we been told?

Here is the bill that was introduced by the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee in the House at that time—Mr. Butler. Here is the way it reads. How different it is from this bill which some of us would have amended and are held up as pacifists by those who have never read the bill, by those who know nothing of the bill. Here is the difference in the two propositions.

Mr. Butler, carrying out the Naval Board's recommendation, introduced this bill:

> That for the purpose of further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States the President of the United States is hereby authorized to undertake the construction of the following vessels: 25 light cruisers, 9 destroyer leaders, 32 submarines, and 5 aircraft carriers.

Nothing is said about a time limit on the proposition. It just authorizes the construction of them, carrying out the administration's idea with reference to them; and that was for the building of 25 cruisers at that time.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that bill was not reported to the House as introduced.

Mr. HARRISON. No.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not know whether a time limit would have been put in or not had the bill been reported in that form.

Mr. HARRISON. No; it was not reported at the time, and so, after a while, they introduced the other bill cutting it down to $285,000,000, I believe; and then it was that they put in the time limit.

Mr. HALE. The original program, Mr. President, covered a period of five years. It would have covered, really, nine years after the laying down of the ships before they would have been finished. At that time a large part of the existing Navy would have become obsolete; and that was a general, comprehensive program to take care of what would be necessary in the future. At the expiration of that time, with the new ships, the Navy would not be as large, as far as numbers of ships are concerned, as it is at the present time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Maine has not quite accurately represented the situation. The fact is that Mr. Wilbur, speaking for the administration, and stating that he spoke with the authority of the President at that time, came before the committee and supported a bill which called for from 71 to 74 ships, none of which were battleships—25 cruisers, a number of destroyers, auxiliary crafts, and so on.

Mr. HALE. Thirty-two submarines.

Mr. KING. I know what I am speaking about—71 to 74 in all, at a cost, he said, of approximately $740,000,000. As a matter of fact, the cost would have been considerably more than $1,000,000,000; and it was stated in his testimony that this was only a starter. Mr. BRITTEN, speaking for the chairman of the committee, asked if this was only a starter, and Mr. Wilbur said yes; it was only a starter.

The fact is that the Senator from Maine and several others have yielded to the navalistic spirit which is flagellating the country, and they wanted to spend more than a billion dollars, and that was to have been merely a starter. Then would have come the construction of additional battleships, and, as Mr. Wilbur said, the cost would have been more than two and one-half billion dollars. That is the policy to which the Senator from Maine is committed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think the Senate understands the situation with regard to our Navy.

A navy is not self-perpetuating. The extreme limit of the life of vessels of the Navy is 20 years; and that limit is applied to battleships and aircraft carriers and cruisers. For destroyers the extreme limit, as determined at Geneva, was 16 years, and for submarine 30 years. Taking an average of 20 years for the life of vessels of the Navy, that means that every year it is necessary to renew one-twentieth of the fleet that we now have if it is to be kept up to its present strength.

Our Navy at the present time is not composed altogether of new vessels. In fact, we have very few new vessels. It was not composed of new vessels at the time of the Washington conference. We have done almost no replacing since the time of the Washington conference. Therefore, what would ordinarily be laid aside to spend every year on replacement of the Navy increases for the years to come; and this proposed legislation was an attempt to forward the program of the Navy Department in an orderly way, to provide for the future replacement of vessels, and to bring us up to the necessary strength that we should have.

That will have to be done in the future if we are to take care of our Navy. We can not afford, every time we are to replace ships of the Navy, to have the outcry all over the country that we are trying to arm so as to fight foreign nations. It is a perfectly orderly procedure to provide each year ahead for the construction of the vessels of the Navy, and that I want to see done, and that this particular bill before us does in providing these 15 cruisers which we are now asking.

Mr. NORRIS rose.

Mr. HARRISON. Did the Senator from Nebraska want to say something?

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to suggest that the Senator from Maine says we are not arming to fight other nations. I was curious to know why we were arming, then.

Mr. HALE. We are arming so that we shall not have to fight other nations.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the same argument has been made every time we have had a naval bill before us, and I had hoped that the Senator would explain why in 1916, when we passed a naval bill, we gave the President three years in which to start the work under it, and in 1924 gave him three years to start work under it, but now it is proposed that he have only five months in which to start work.

Mr. CARAWAY. We had a Democratic President then, and they had confidence in him.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Maine had more confidence, I take it, in President Wilson than he has in the President elect.

Mr. President, I can see no reason why we should not strike out this time limitation. As I have cited, in these other instances we gave the President three years. If we have confidence in the President elect—I have confidence in him, and it looks as if some of us have more confidence in him than the Senator from Maine has—if we are right in the proposition that we might limit armament construction as a result of the conference to be held in 1931, if we are right that we ought to agree upon the rules and regulations for the conduct of nations upon the seas as to the rights of belligerents, and the rights of neutrals, then let us give the President a free hand. Let him have an opportunity for real accomplishments when we go into these conferences. Let him have the power to build the cruisers, and in working out the plan for these conferences he may, if he pleases, use this legislation as a weapon of diplomacy, in order to force the hands of the other participants. Let us not go ahead and start the building of some ships within four or five months which might be scrapped. I do not know whether they will be or not; nobody else knows. The naval experts say that of course they will not be scrapped. They told us that the battleships would not be scrapped; but they were scrapped. I know that the American people to-day are not able to bear the heavy load of taxation which some people would force down upon them. They are still suffering from war responsibilities, and if I vote to put in this time limitation, and the disarmament conference should come on and should stop the further construction of those particular cruisers, I would have to explain to my constituents why it was that I voted against striking out the time limitation.

What harm can come from striking it out? What injury can come to the country from writing into the law, if you please, a 3-year provision, or a 2-year provision, or making it applicable following the adjournment of the next disarmament conference, in the meanwhile giving the President the power and the authority to build these cruisers? No one can say it would do an injustice to the country. We are not about to get into war with any country in the world.

Mr. HALE. How does the Senator know whether we are or not? The Senator can not say whether we will get into a war with any other country or not. Nobody thought we would get into a war a year before the World War.

Mr. CARAWAY. Everybody knew we would be in the war.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator has something in his breast, something he has not revealed to us, about some controversy with some foreign country with which we are about to get into a war. He ought to tell us about it.

Mr. HALE. I have not, nor had Senators in the Senate at that time.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. The fact that President Coolidge recommended the cutting out of the time limit would indicate that the President does not think there is any immediate prospect of war.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, he wants it cut out. The State Department no doubt wants to put it off. The President elect of the United States wants to put it off.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the Senator thinks we are going to have war with Nicaragua and wants us to be prepared by having more battleships,

Mr. HALE. I think the President of the United States has already notified the country, through his talk with newspaper men, that he is ready to go ahead and authorize the construction of a certain number of ships. What we want to do is to provide by this bill when those ships shall be built, as we have a right to do as a body, under the terms of the provision of the Constitution by which we are required to provide and maintain a Navy.

Mr. HARRISON. If we notice there are many of the cruisers which are now being constructed that will not be finished until 1931. Who is calling for the immediate construction of the cruisers provided for in this bill? We have not been told that the naval board has done so. The proponents of this bill disclaim that the Secretary of the Navy has recommended it. The President of the United States is not insisting upon it. On the other hand, the President is appealing to his followers here to stand by him, and give to him and his successor the discretion to build them within the next three years, or to wait until at least after the next disarmament conference.

Mr. WHEELER. The Daughters of the American Revolution and the Navy League are back of it.

Mr. HARRISON. I think some people have been misled as to what is in this bill. I think that many of the societies which are advocating the immediate building of these cruisers under a time limit that is unprecedented do not know the real facts about the matter. Their purposes are high-minded but they are deceived. They do not recall that in all prior instances we have given the President three years in which to construct the vessels. They are misled by the speeches of such distinguished gentlemen as the Senator from Maine.

Who is it that is bringing influence to bear? Of course, it would help the Bethlehem Steel Co. It would probably help other steel interests in this country. The Government would need more armor plate, they will need to utilize more steel. It would give more employment to the men of those concerns, perhaps. It would add to their profits; yes. Of course, the chambers of commerce at Newport News, and perhaps at Norfolk, and perhaps at San Francisco, and other places in the country where there are great navy yards, have passed their resolutions, as have other organizations in those places. Perhaps the influential political leaders in the centers where these ships would be constructed have written to their Senators and their Representatives appealing to them to support this measure. But, Mr. President, that should not influence us in this particular instance.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows that that consideration would not influence a Senator in this body.

Mr. HARRISON. I know it would not influence the Senator from Maine. That idea would be ridiculous.

Mr. HALE. Nor the Senator from Mississippi, or any other Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no navy yards in my State, so I am immune.

Mr. HALE. It is unworthy of the Senator to make that suggestion.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, I will withdraw it. I must say to my friend, though, that I am glad I have no navy yard in my State, because I fear then I would be getting a lot of letters about it.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, at the time of the discussion on this pending bill on the floor of the House one of the members of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House at that time made the statement that unless this bill were passed the shipyards would have to go out of business.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I want to see a navy adequate for the defense of this country, as everyone else here does. I have so voted throughout my 18 years of public service. I am willing to give to the President the authority to build these 15 cruisers, with the time limit left out.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator is hoping that he will not build them.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I hope it will not be necessary to build them. I sincerely hope, as an advocate of peace in this country, that Mr. Hoover will show those high qualities of statesmanship which will lead him to call a conference, and that the conference will be successful, so that we can limit armaments, not only battleship construction, but the construction of submarines, airplanes, battle cruisers, and everything else of the kind. I hope we can agree upon rules and regulations as to rights of belligerents and neutrals upon the seas, and that it will not be necessary to build any more battleships or any more cruisers. The Senator objects to that.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to read what the President elect, Mr. Hoover, said in his acceptance speech on August 11 last.

Mr. HARRISON. We have read that.

Mr. HALE. He said——

Mr. HARRISON. I read that three or four times. It did not sound very good to me at the time.

Mr. HALE. I want to read it, if the Senator does not object. Mr. Hoover said:

> We believe that the foundations of peace can be strengthened by the creation of methods and agencies by which a multitude of incidents may be transferred from the realm of prejudice and force to arbitration and the determination of right and wrong based upon international law.
> We have been and we are particularly desirous of furthering the limitation of armaments. But in the meantime we know that in an armed world there is only one certain guaranty of freedom—and that is preparedness for defense. It is solely to defend ourselves, for the protection of our citizens that we maintain armament. No clearer evidence of this can exist than the unique fact that we have fewer men in Army uniform to-day than we have in police uniforms, and that we maintain a standing invitation to the world that we are always ready to limit our naval armament in proportion as the other naval nations will do likewise. We earnestly wish that the burdens and dangers of armament upon every home in the world might be lessened. But we must and shall maintain our naval defense and our merchant marine in the strength and efficiency which will yield to us at all times the primary assurance of liberty; that is, of national safety.

And, Mr. President, our Navy is not in that condition now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am not finding fault with those sentiments of Mr. Hoover which have been read, nor am I finding fault with the communication the Senator from Maine read to the Senate the other day. The Senator does not doubt that the President elect is against the time limit in this cruiser measure?

Mr. HALE. I have no knowledge of the matter other than the information contained in the telegram.

Mr. HARRISON. The only two gentlemen in this body who entertain any doubt as to the position of the President elect are the present Presiding Officer [Mr. ODDIE in the chair] and the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. Everyone else knows that the President is opposed to the time limitation. He has appealed to Senators to strike it out. He wants to have a free hand in the conferences which are to be held. He is hopeful that we can arrive at some common understanding with the nations of the world. He is hopeful that he can carry on his policy of economy and make a saving for the taxpayer by wiping out the necessity of carrying on this great naval construction. I doubt not that he has appealed to the Senator from Maine himself to strike out the time limitation. But the Senator is a hardened sinner when it comes to that. So is the present Presiding Officer in regard to that matter. So it was that President Coolidge himself, knowing the sympathies of the Senator for him, of their close and intimate friendship, sent the communication of the President elect to him, and the Senator himself read it to this body, and this is what Mr. Hoover said, and this was only January 28.

Mr. CARAWAY. But the Senator knows we must "construe that broadly." The present Presiding Officer so stated.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; the present Presiding Officer said, "You must construe this broadly." I am construing it broadly.

Mr. CARAWAY. What does "construe it broadly" mean?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Hoover said:

> As you know, I warmly support your own views, and you may so inform others if you wish to do so.

He did not say that he warmly supported the views of the Senator from Maine, or of the Naval Affairs Committee. He did not say that he warmly supported the views of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], a member of that committee. He said "I warmly support your own views," with reference to that matter, and the President's views were that the time limit should be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is the Senator now trying to make up for the fact that his State was one of the few that did not vote for Mr. Hoover, and therefore to get on the right side of the President elect?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no; I am always with those of the opposite party when they are right. The trouble with some of you gentlemen is that you are wrong so often you do not know the right when you see it.

Mr. KING. If he did, he would do what the Senator from Connecticut never has done—be on the right side.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to find out one thing, because I knew that it would creep out sooner or later—that some Senators on the other side have no confidence in the next President of the United States.

I wish him success in his international dealings with nations in the conference that is coming on. I want to give to him the power to build the cruisers if it is necessary, but the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Connecticut, warm friends that they are of the President elect, do not agree with me in that regard.

Mr. HALE. We are upholding the hands of the President when we do this.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; you are—but I have said all I want to say. I am going to vote to strike out the time limit. I shall do it in the interests of peace, and I shall do it in the hope that the President elect will be able to conclude some kind of an understanding with reference to marine law and a limitation of all kinds of naval armament.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator referred to the time limit in the 1916 program. That limitation was stricken out in the 1919 appropriation bill, where the words appear:

> But not later than June 30, 1919, is hereby repealed.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Maine knows that in 1916 that wording was inserted in the bill.

Mr. HALE. That was in the original bill and stricken out in 1919.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course it was; and in 1918 it was written in again, giving the same length of time in which to construct.

Mr. HALE. The words appear here:

> Not later than June 30, 1919, is hereby repealed.

This was done in 1919.

Mr. HARRISON. That shows the correctness of our position.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question in connection with the time-limit provision. If we leave the time-limit provision in the bill, what is there that will compel the President to actually build the ships within the time mentioned in the bill?

Mr. HALE. The provisions of the bill do not direct the President to construct the cruisers. The bill merely authorizes him to do so. I think it is safe to say that very few Presidents, in view of the expressed wish of Congress that the vessels shall be started by such and such a time, would decline to act in accordance with that expressed wish.

Mr. DILL. If the time limit is taken out, is it not possible for the President to build just as many of them as fast as he wants to build them?

Mr. HALE. Of course, all that the President can do is to make recommendations to Congress for the appropriations.

Mr. DILL. We can build them all in the next two years if we have no limitation in the bill, can we not?

Mr. HALE. Yes; but if we have no limitation, they could be built at any time in the future, or not at all.

Mr. DILL. And if we have the limitation the President still is not compelled to build them, is he?

Mr. HALE. He is not absolutely compelled to do so; but if Congress has expressed itself on the matter, I think no President would turn that down, especially after what happened in the case of the last three cruisers authorized in 1924. Congress at that time expressed itself as standing for what it had already authorized and insisted on its rights in the matter.

Mr. DILL. The fact is that when we authorize the cruisers the President then is at liberty to make recommendations to Congress, and Congress is at liberty to accept those recommendations in the form of appropriations to build the cruisers just as fast as we want to build them. The mere fact that we have a provision directing them to be built within a certain number of years is not compulsory, and if the President sees fit to turn down that recommendation he may do so.

Mr. HALE. He could; and should he do so, I am very certain that Congress would take the matter into its own hands and make the necessary appropriations and direct the construction of the necessary cruisers.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Section 4 of the cruiser bill reads as follows:

SEC. 4. In the event of an international agreement, which the President is requested to encourage, for the further limitation of naval armament, to which the United States is signatory, the President is hereby authorized and empowered to suspend in whole or in part any of the naval construction authorized under this act.

Has section 4 been changed or amended in any way?

Mr. HALE. No; I have not seen any amendment suggested.

Mr. HEFLIN. It stands as it is now?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. If that is the case, then the President can suspend the building and none of the cruisers can be constructed unless he wishes?

Mr. HALE. That is very true, after an agreement has been reached on limitation of armaments. That is quite true.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, in any part which I might take in this debate upon the cruiser bill I want at the outset to have it clearly understood that my attitude, though in opposition to this cruiser program upon the general cause for armaments, is not in keeping with that of those who believe the hour has arrived when the United States can afford to or should utterly abandon armaments or submit its defenseless self to the possible thrusts of other nations.

Instead I quite approve such acts as will afford complete and adequate means of defensive warfare, and I desire to see every reasonable precaution taken against any possible attack upon us.

But this program calling for the construction of 15 new cruisers and 1 plane carrier at a cost of a quarter of a billion dollars or more is to my mind both morally and economically unsound. It is a program, I often fear, too much of bluff and bluster, calling for a gigantic expenditure for instruments of war which would not be worth as much as the powder to blow them up in another war, bringing as it will, if more war must come, modern means of warfare which would leave cruisers helpless to defend themselves. It is a program which is wholly uncalled for at this time, engineered in the main by our Admiral Plunketts, aided by the private shipbuilders. It is a program calling for appropriations which are going to be a severe drain upon the Treasury which must soon produce that material wherewithal essential to the stabilization of our agricultural industry and thus perfect or improve our first line of defense. It is a program calling for just the opposite reaction to that which is desired at this time, namely, the desire for better understanding among the nations of the world and consequent decreasing of armaments. It is a program that might very easily find us within a few years moving more of our ships out into the Atlantic for scrapping, just as was done only a few years ago; a program, however, to which shipbuilders have no objection. It is a program based upon false premises in that it aims at parity with Great Britain whereas that parity is already enjoyed, if we will accept the word of President Coolidge; and in that it is based upon the presumption that there is danger of war with Great Britain, whereas there is no such danger in view unless we are going to assume that the interests of our international money barons is going to invite the antagonism of Great Britain and call for a display of arms in their defense and in defense of their interests. Far better, to my mind, that we spend our money if need be in curtailing the selfish ones than providing for their defense after their selfishness has led them into trouble.

In his message to Congress two years ago President Coolidge told us that our Navy was equal to the British Navy, slightly behind with cruisers, but ahead with submarines and destroyers. "Only one navy in the world approaches ours and none surpass it," said the President then. Since that time it is my understanding that the United States has laid the keels for 7 or 8 new cruisers, while Britain has laid for 6. According to reliable statistics compiled from figures authorized by responsible advocates of this bill, the United States has 40 cruisers now, as compared with 64 for Great Britain. But while we are short on cruisers, the United States has 295 destroyers against 187 for Great Britain and 124 submarines against 74 for Great Britain. The tonnage of the cruisers, destroyers, and submarines owned by the United States is approximately 768,000, while the tonnage of British cruisers, destroyers, and submarines is something like 65,000 less, or 703,000 tons. This would certainly not indicate that we were out of step with Great Britain in any manner, and instead satisfies my mind that we have won more than a parity with Great Britain in the matter of naval strength.

While these figures are not altogether material to the argument I am making at this time, I think it well that they be presented the Senate for the purpose of inviting such criticism as will bring out the true facts.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. NYE. I have caused to be hung upon the wall of the Chamber a chart showing the number of ships and the tonnage in unlimited classes built, building, and appropriated for in the navies of the United States and Great Britain. Above the horizontal line the chart indicates the number of cruisers, the number of destroyers, and the number of submarines which are the property of the United States, and the last three columns above the horizontal line indicate the cruisers, destroyers, and submarines which are the property of the British Empire. Beneath the horizontal line is shown the comparative naval strength by tonnage of the two countries in destroyers, cruisers, and submarines. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] a moment ago gave the number of cruisers Great Britain has, as well as the number which belongs to the United States. With the Senator's permission I would like to state that of the 67 cruisers credited by him to Great Britain, 9 are obsolete and of this number some have been disposesd of. I should also like to state that one of them, the Comus, was laid down in 1913, and 38 were laid down between 1914 and 1918. Most of this number were completed during the war, and all of them with the exception of the Comus, were projected during the World War and for use in that great conflict. Six of the 39 were specially designed to combat German naval craft operating in the North Sea; 2 of them have a tonnage of 7,500 tons; 3 have a tonnage of 9,750 tons each, and one 9,770; the remaining 33 cruisers are small craft ranging between 3,750 and 4,700 tons. The armament carried by these cruisers consists of four 6-inch guns, and the cruisers were constructed largely for patrol duty in the North Sea.

They were not built for what might be called sea service, and possessed many of the weaknesses that are found in craft which were hastily built during the war to meet a situation of peril and danger. Most of these boats were subjected to enormous strain because of the arduous service to which they were put, and many of them are practically obsolescent and will, within a short time, be obsolete. They are not comparable in size and strength or fighting qualities to the ten 7,500-ton cruisers completed by the United States between 1923 and 1925.

Some of the proponents of this bill failed to state that the United States, in addition to the 10 cruisers last referred to, is constructing eight 10,000-ton cruisers which, perhaps, will be superior to any ships afloat falling within that category, nor do they mention the fact that the United States has 22 cruisers, some of which are 14,500 tons displacement. It is true these cruisers are old and most of them are obsolete.

Scant reference is made by the advocates of this bill to the character of the small cruisers built by Great Britain during the war and their lack of capacity and quality for naval service.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I did not hear the first part of the statement of the Senator from Utah. I did, however, hear him state that the British cruisers are not fitted for long ocean voyages. I think he is entirely mistaken about that. They are vessels running from 3,750 tons to 9,750 tons.

Mr. KING. I know the vessels and their tonnage from the Comus, which has a displacement of 3,750 tons, to the Hawkins, which has a displacement of 9,750 tons.

Mr. HALE. Those vessels are fitted for long ocean voyages, and they are all used for long ocean voyages.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator from Maine is an authority upon this subject, and he often challenges statements of Senators, even though he does not hear them, who speak upon the other side.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator restate what he said, for I only heard what he said as I came into the Chamber?

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I object to any further delay. I think the Senator from Utah has offered some very worthwhile comments at this particular point in addition to what I stated.

I should like also to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that 41 of these 64 cruisers are not of the 10,000-ton type or of the greater efficiency type, but are under 6,000 tons, and also that 33 of these 64 "modern" cruisers are not so modern but what they saw service in the late great World War.

Mr. President, the chart which I have caused to be hung up on the wall shows the comparative strength of the two nations in a naval way which I have just recited; but, of course, it is answered, and I expect will now be answered, that this does not account for the entire strength of the two navies; that we are forgetting the battleships, that we are forgetting other monsters of the sea that enter into the channels of war in time of war. With that thought in mind, I have prepared a table as to capital ships which I wish could be presented as the strength in destroyers, cruisers, and submarines is presented by virtue of the wall chart. However, the table which I have prepared shows the capital ships, carriers, and other combatant ships of the first and second line possessed by these two great countries. This table accounts for the ships which are built, ships which are in the building, and ships which have been appropriated for.

Of capital ships—battleships and battle cruisers—built and building and appropriated for, the United States has 18, Great Britain has 20. The tonnage of those of the United States is 525,850, while the tonnage of the British ships is 556,350.

Of aircraft carriers, built and being converted, the United States has three, representing a tonnage of 78,700. Great Britain has six, representing a tonnage of 107,550.

Of first and second line cruisers, the United States has 40, with a tonnage of 334,425, while Great Britain has 64, with a tonnage of 397,140.

Of destroyers of the first and second line built, building, and appropriated, including the 25 which are now in the service of the Coast Guard, the United States has 295, representing a tonnage of 340,994, while Great Britain has 187, representing a tonnage of 230,470.

Of submarines built, building, and appropriated for, the United States has 124, representing a tonnage of 92,979, while Great Britain has 74, representing a tonnage of 75,425.

Of light mine layers the United States has 14, with a tonnage of 16,674, while Great Britain has none.

Of mine layers of the first line each country has two, those of the United States representing a tonnage of 7,600 and those of Great Britain a tonnage of 11,810.

Of mine layers of the second line the United States has two and Great Britain none. The tonnage represented by the two of the United States is 8,496.

Thus, Mr. President, we have a total of ships possessed by the United States of 498 compared with a total of 357 accruing to Great Britain. The tonnage represented by the vessels of the United States is 1,405,718, while the tonnage of the British Navy is 1,407,565. Of combatant ships the United States has 141 more than Great Britain. With relation to these ships, in tonnage, Great Britain has the edge over us with a margin of 1,847 tons.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, in connection with the comparison of the navies I hope the Senator will go on and show a comparison of the armies. If he will bear with me for just a moment, I should like to point out to him that with our population of 118,000,000 people we have a standing Army of 137,000 men; while Great Britain has a standing army of 400,000 men; France, 727,000 men; Russia, 644,000 men; Italy, 380,000; Poland, 280,000 men; Yugoslavia, 240,000; Japan, 210,000 men. As national defense embraces not only the Navy but the Army, in order to find out how well prepared we are we should also consider the armies of other countries and not merely their navies.

Mr. NYE. Yes; and I hope that I have considered both sides; and yet I do not see that the facts which the Senator has presented at this time have any material bearing upon the immediate program which now lies before the Senate.

Of the 64 British cruisers to which I have called attention 41 are under 6,000 tons and 33 saw service in the World War. The British have completed 15 cruisers and the United States 10 cruisers since the Washington conference. Each country has 8 under construction at the present time.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the Senator will want to show that the 10 that we have completed are cruisers carrying 6-inch guns and the 15 that Great Britain has completed and is now building carry 8-inch guns.

Mr. NYE. I will say to the Senator that it was not my plan, in view of all the facts which have been offered for the RECORD with relation to this program, to go into that feature at this time, because I am not making it a material part of my argument but only presenting what I am sure are the facts.

The United States has eight 10,000-ton cruisers, while Great Britain has thirteen 10,000-ton cruisers.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, Great Britain has seven 10,000-ton cruisers already built, 8 building, 2 more appropriated for and 3 more authorized; so that she will have 20 such vessels when they shall have been completed. It is fair to say, however, that six of these are not 10,000-ton vessels but cruisers of 8,300 tons, though they do carry 8-inch guns.

Mr. NYE. Two of the cruisers to which the Senator makes reference have been delivered to Australia, have they not?

Mr. HALE. That has nothing to do with it, Mr. President.

Mr. NYE. Why, then, is not the Senator including in his figures the naval strength of Canada and of the other dominions of Great Britain?

Mr. HALE. I have included the naval strength of the dominions of Great Britain.

Mr. NYE. But not of Australia.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, including Australia.

Mr. NYE. I did not so understand, and I am glad to have that correction by the Senator. However, Mr. President, as nearly as I can ascertain, an increase of five cruisers at this time would give us parity with Great Britain. Of 10,000-ton cruisers, three, I understand, are appropriated for by Great Britain, but their construction is being held in abeyance awaiting ostensibly to see what the United States is going to do.

Mr. HALE. No; I think not as to the two that have been appropriated for. I think that applies to the three that have been authorized.

Mr. NYE. I meant "authorized," Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. But there never has been a question of their giving them up. It is simply a question of postponing them, as they did once before.

Mr. NYE. With relation to cruisers, however, let it be noted that among those owned by the United States are the fastest cruisers afloat to-day. I recite these facts not because they are material to the argument I am about to make but merely that the record may be clear; and I thank the Senator for offering whatever corrections were entered at this juncture.

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, the fact that our cruisers are faster cruisers than the cruisers of Great Britain is due to the fact that they have put on their cruisers a certain amount of armor which we do not have on ours; and this additional weight cuts down the speed of the cruisers to a very limited extent. They are still very fast cruisers.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, we now have this program before us to build almost overnight 15 new cruisers. By the time they are completed there is no doubt in my mind but that if cruisers are still to be constructed those that we are authorizing now will be so obsolete and out of date that men like the Senator from Maine are going to come back before the Senate and say, "We have been outstripped now, and these 15 cruisers mean absolutely nothing to our strength."

I have before me a page taken from a recent edition of the Washington Daily News—that of January 23, to be exact—bearing the heading:

German mystery ship may cause junking of existing navies. New craft said to be greatest fighting ship ever built.

The article is written by Mr. William Philip Simms; and I ask that it may be incorporated in and made a part of my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Wednesday, January 23, 1929]

GERMAN MYSTERY SHIP MAY CAUSE JUNKING OF EXISTING NAVIES—NEW CRAFT SAID TO BE GREATEST FIGHTING SHIP EVER BUILT—HAS BEEN EVOLVED BY GERMAN SCIENTISTS SINCE NATION WAS LIMITED TO 10,000-TON CRAFT—BUILT OF SPECIAL STEEL—CAN MOUNT SIX 11-INCH GUNS WHEREAS 8-INCH ARE OUR BIGGEST—SPEED 30 MILES AN HOUR

By William Philip Simms

Is the United States Navy, our first line of defense and safeguard against invasion in time of war, about to be converted into so much junk by the invention of a brand-new and more efficient type of vessel?

Similarly, are all the other existing navies of the world—including that of Great Britain, with which we demand parity, ton for ton—on the eve of being relegated to the limbo of the obsolete or the not-so-good?

Is the treaty of Washington framed to limit the naval armaments of the United States, Britain, Japan, France, and Italy, to be turned into a scrap of paper by recent marine developments in the sixth country entirely outside the jurisdiction of that treaty?

SECRET GERMAN SHIP

These questions are being asked uneasily not alone in Washington but in London, Tokio, Paris, and Rome following revelations from Berlin concerning the secret ship which German scientists have evolved and which conservative naval experts pronounce the most remarkable fighting craft ever laid down.

Forbidden by the treaty of Versailles to have a regular navy through being limited to craft not exceeding 10,000 tons displacement, Germany has been quietly seeking for years to evolve a baby battleship which would be a match for the big fellows. Necessity being the mother of invention, she now seems to have found what she was looking for.

It is called the Ersatz Preussen—Prussia's substitute for a dreadnought or the beginning of a "synthetic" German Navy. And while it may not answer to a technician's definition of proper navy, in practice it may be able to lick the stuffing out of the real thing, if and when the test comes—which is all that any German could require or any other nation fear.

MADE OF SPECIAL STEEL

The Ersatz Preussen displaces 10,000 tons. Her hull is in one piece, electrically welded from stem to stern. It is made of a special steel secretly developed by the Krupps and is similarly armored. She mounts six 11-inch guns with a 30,000-yard range and can fire a salvo every 20 seconds, making her more than a match for any three 10,000-ton cruisers in the British or American Navy. Eight-inch guns are the biggest our cruisers may mount.

Powered with internal-combustion Diesel engines of a new pattern, she can do approximately 30 miles an hour. Up to now engineers have figured motors of this kind would have to weigh upward of 60 pounds per horsepower, but the Ersatz Preussen's are said to develop one horsepower for every 17.5 pounds weight. And so economical are they in fuel consumption that at 20 knots an hour the mystery ship could do 10,000 miles without refueling or nearly 20,000 miles at a slower and more economical speed, making her the earth's most dangerous potential commerce raider.

BUILT REGARDLESS OF EXPENSE

Germany has built this ship regardless of expense. She represents the hitherto unthinkable in warships. She is to fighting craft what the German Big Bertha that fired 75 miles on Paris was to artillery. Experts said it could not be done yet it was done. What is to keep Germany—or England or Japan or any other country with the price—from building a navy composed of ships developed from these and obtaining complete mastery of the seas?

Obviously the world must reckon with this new naval weapon. Henceforth a naval conference which left Germany out, would get nowhere because she might undo anything the conferring powers might do. It is also obvious that ships built now, without taking the Ersatz Preussen into consideration, would likely be obsolete before they were laid down.

The future battleship, many experts believe, may surpass even Germany's latest. It may have the combined attributes of the dreadnought, the submarine, the cruiser, and the aircraft carrier, all in one. It may fight in the air, on the sea, and under the sea. Admiral William S. Sims, one of the clearest thinkers our Navy has produced, makes it plain that he is not blind to the possibilities. Thus the limitation of naval armament, when next the problem arises, of necessity must not only include more than five nations to be effective but must be vastly wider in scope as well.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think that matter has already been brought up in the Senate. The Senator knows, of course, that that sort of a ship would not be allowed under the terms of the Washington conference, and I can not see that it has any special significance.

Mr. NYE. It has just this significance—that there is every reason in the world why, within the next few months, or two or three years at the outset, the nations of the earth are going to come to their senses long enough to sit down with their feet under one table again and determine that it is time to take real, definite, forward-looking action that is going to put a stop to this ever-crowding program, first on the part of Britain and then on the part of the United States—a program which finds the United States now stepping into this program calling for 15 new cruisers, with Great Britain sitting back to see what we are going to do about it; and if we proceed and go through with it, as I am afraid we are going to do, Great Britain then immediately will respond with a like building program, not to seek a parity with us, but to put themselves ahead of us. Then it will be up to us again to repeat our part in that program—an endless, never-ending program of building, building, building machines that to my mind in the next war are going to be of little or no utility.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that we will be stronger in a conference on the limitation of armament if our Navy is not in a negligible condition at the time?

Mr. NYE. I do not. I have heard and read much of that argument, but I can not grasp it. I can not make it a part of my mind at all.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think that the partial success we obtained at the 1922 conference was largely due to the fact that we had a great program building that no other country could hope to equal?

Mr. NYE. Possibly, and yet I doubt it; and if we are to look upon it as having served that purpose prior to that conference and at the time of the conference, then we are going to have to admit that it is an exceedingly expensive program to bring about anything of that kind.

In connection with my argument there, the New York Times of this morning, in the first column on the first page, contains an article by Edwin L. James, a dispatch from London, under the heading Britain Will Build Navy Equaling Ours, Bridgeman Asserts. I read only two paragraphs from that article:

It is the position of the British Government that it has no right to appear to interfere in the Senate discussion of the cruiser bill, which is entirely the business of the United States; but after the United States has decided on its course of action it becomes the business of Britain to keep level with American cruiser construction, said W. C. Bridgeman, First Lord of the Admiralty, in discussing the naval situation before the Constitutional Club to-day, when he made the official British position clear. Denying that Britain would set the pace in construction of big cruisers, the official head of the British fleet said others had set the pace, and that while committed to a policy of naval equality with the United States, Britain nevertheless did not intend to be outstripped. She had done more than her part toward naval reduction, he said.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think it is rather a joke for Great Britain to state that she will keep her navy up to our Navy when she is very far ahead of us at the present time?

Mr. NYE. I do not concede that she is far ahead of us.

Mr. HALE. I think most experts would concede that; would they not?

Mr. NYE. The Senator's own figures, from which I have quoted here this afternoon, indicate that in actual tonnage she excels us by a margin of only 2,000 tons or so.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is including in that actual tonnage a vast number of surplus destroyers that we have on hand.

Mr. NYE. And of surplus British ships to offset it.

Mr. HALE. No; I think they will not offset it.

Mr. NYE. Has the Senator offered anything in the RECORD to show how much or how little offset there might be on the part of the British Navy?

Mr. HALE. I have not built up the tables in exactly that way; but, of course, that could be done.

Mr. NYE. If these that are included in the Senator's figures are obsolete, why has he included them?

Mr. HALE. They are not obsolete. These figures are right up to date, and are furnished me by the Navy Department. The Senator has included in his tonnage a great many ships which are not ordinarily considered combatant ships. Ordinarily, when you take the combatant ships of a navy, you refer to battleships, battle cruisers, carriers, cruisers, destroyers, and submarines.

Mr. NYE. Then what of the 20, 22, or 24 British ships which are stipulated only for virtually coast-guard purposes in the North Sea?

Mr. HALE. Oh, I simply gave a list of the combatant ships that were being carried on the navy lists.

Mr. NYE. Then the Senator will admit that there is an offset?

Mr. HALE. No; I do not. Of course, we shall have to be building a great many more combatant ships in the near future ourselves; but as far as these destroyers are concerned, I want to say that they were built by us in these large numbers largely at the instigation of Great Britain.

During the war we had a great number of capital ships on the stocks, and we were going ahead with the completion of these ships. On the request of the British that we help them to control the submarine menace we built destroyers, whereas the British built cruisers. That left us at a manifest disadvantage at the end of the war. We were willing to do so because we were all acting in a common cause at the time; but that accounts for our great surplusage of destroyers.

We have 266 destroyers at the present time. We keep up only 104 with the fleet, and it is inconceivable that we should use them all. We simply keep them laid up in the navy yards. Each year these vessels are going behind. They are not up to the modern type of destroyer that is now being constructed.

All of the other countries that are parties to the Washington agreement have gone ahead and built a new type of destroyer called the destroyer leader. We have not any of these ships at all. This is a much more powerful, much more seaworthy vessel than the present destroyer. We are falling back as far as destroyers are concerned. If we put in commission the destroyers that we do have it will cost us a great deal of money to do so. We probably would do it if we got into a war, because we have not cruisers enough for the work of cruisers. We should have, to a certain extent, to use these destroyers for that purpose; but destroyers can not take the place of cruisers, and we would be nearly as well off if we did not have this great surplusage of destroyers.

Mr. NYE. Be all of that as it may, I venture the guess that if we get into another war one of the last things we will do, after all is said and done, is to equip more above-surface vessels for use in war time. I think it is not going to take long in the next war, if we must have another war, to convince us all that they are not a tool of any utility.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is entirely at variance with the experience of the other countries of the world, all of which are building up their surface-vessel equipment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator referred to the parity or equality of our fleet. May I add to what he said the statement of Mr. Hector Bywater, who is one of the ablest writers upon naval matters?

Mr. NYE. I am glad the Senator is making reference to that. He stated, in substance, that taking all factors into consideration, "the American fleet is adjudged to be superior to the British fleet," and that "even in gun power the advantage is held to lie with the American fleet."

It is a fact that seven of the capital ships that were built by the United States between 1919 and 1923 are superior in construction and equipment and in fighting strength and power to those of the British Navy, with perhaps the exception of the Nelson and the Rodney, the two most recent capital ships constructed by Great Britain.

Mr. President, from a somewhat careful investigation of the qualities and character of the British and American naval vessels, I believe that Mr. Bywater's statement is true; and I believe that the American fleet in a naval battle would be able to defeat Great Britain's fleet.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, that is entirely a matter of speculation.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly. Mr. President, there are elements of uncertainty in every naval contest as there are factors of uncertainty in battles upon land. Many battles on land and sea are won or lost as the result of contingencies or accidents or fortuitous circumstances against which no human foresight could have provided.

The matter of visability may determine a naval contest; a torpedo fired from a submarine may prove the decisive factor in an important naval battle. An accidental hit may destroy a battleship or battle cruiser and thus give the balance of power to the fleet to which the submarine belongs.

It is my opinion that the American capital ships are superior to those of the British fleet. We are superior in submarines and in destroyers. And in aviation we are far ahead of Great Britain. Our aircraft carriers, although fewer in number, are superior to those of Great Britain. Our battleships carry airplanes but the British capital ships do not. Weighing all facts which go to determine the fighting qualities of a fleet, I think I am absolutely safe in saying that the American fleet is superior to the British fleet.

The President of the United States has stated that no fleet surpasses ours and that it is the equal of any. Since he made that statement we have pushed forward the construction of eight 10,000-ton cruisers, one of which was launched a day or two ago. The Senator from Maine has referred to the large number of destroyers belonging to our fleet, and has said that they were constructed at the suggestion of Admiral Sims. I do not know whether he intends, by that statement, to convey the impression that destroyers are not necessary auxiliary craft. The fact is that they are not only highly important but absolutely indispensable to a modern fleet.

The development of the submarine has given to the destroyers an increased importance. Senators will recall that early in the World War German submarines were taking heavy toll of the merchant ships, not only of belligerents but of neutral nations. When Admiral Sims, representing the United States, went to Great Britain the latter part of 1916, or early in 1917, he quickly discovered that the Allied cause was seriously endangered by the ravages of the submarine. My recollection is that he urged our Government to provide naval craft to aid in combating the submarine. After the United States entered the war it addressed itself with commendable vigor to the construction of those vessels deemed important, if not vital, in defeating the Central Powers. More than 260 destroyers were built. They measured up to the highest standard of efficiency and of technical development. They are efficient and up to date at the present time.

Mr. NYE. And would last as long in the event of another war as the 10,000-ton cruisers of the best type would.

Mr. KING. It is true that all of our destroyers are not in commission, but they are well cared for in suitable berths and within a few days would be ready for service upon the high seas.

The Senator from Maine referred to the leaders. I suppose he has in mind what some call flotilla leaders. They are large destroyers to head the destroyer squadrons. However, the number of flotilla leaders possessed by Great Britain is small and its destroyer fleet is very much below that of the United States. The United States, in my opinion, is superior to Great Britain in capital ships, in destroyers, in submarines, in air carriers, and in airplanes. In the air our country is supreme, and on the surface of the sea and under the sea I believe we are superior to any other nation in the elements of naval warfare. It is true that Great Britain has a larger number of cruisers than the United States. As I stated, we have constructed 10 modern cruisers each having a displacement of 7,500 tons. The eight 10,000-ton cruisers which will soon be completed will perhaps be superior to those of any other fleet. But as I have indicated, more than 30 of Great Britain's cruisers are very small, having been built for patrol duty in the North Sea during the World War and no great importance can be ascribed to them in the appraising of the value, strength, and power of a great navy such as that proposed by the United States or Great Britain. In my opinion our ten 7,500-ton cruisers possess greater importance and value than the small patrol cruisers which are so often referred to by proponents of this bill when they seek to convey the idea that Great Britain has an enormous number of cruisers. As all naval writers and experts state, the value of a navy does not depend upon the number of ships in the fleet, nor for that matter is the fighting quality of a fleet dependent upon the size of its guns. Von Scheer had no guns of greater caliber than 12 inches in the Battle of Jutland, but he was able to destroy mighty British cruisers, and, as I believe, he won that memorable contest. The Senator from Maine during the debate has repeatedly insisted that in the event of a conference to secure the limitation of armaments, the position of the Government would be much stronger if it had a larger battle fleet; in other words, if we were to sit down at an international table to secure or promote disarmament, our chance of success would be increased by the number of cards we hold in our hands. I do not quite understand this logic or psychology. I do not like the thought of sitting down with the nations as if we were about to play a game of cards and gamble with the lives and destinies of men and nations.

The statement has been made that the United States was victimized at the Washington conference, or at any rate our Government was the one which made the greatest sacrifice. Senators forget that Great Britain, immediately following the war, scrapped more than 1,300,000 tons of her naval craft; that Japan scrapped a large number of ships belonging to her navy. The United States, however, under the whip and spur of the navalists of the United States pushed forward the 1916 program which called for the construction of approximately 156 naval craft, at a cost of more than a billion dollars. Sixteen battleships and battle cruisers were included within this stupendous program. No nation had ever projected a program of such magnitude and such stupendous cost. France and Italy scrapped many of their naval vessels; but the United States seemed unable to resist the militaristic spirit and yielded to the demands of the naval board and spent tens of millions of dollars to bring about the speedy completion of the 1916 naval program.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in January, 1921, offered a resolution in the Senate directing the Naval Affairs Committee to report whether, in its opinion, it was practical and a sound policy to suspend the naval construction for a 6-month period, in order that an investigation might be had as to the requirements of our Government and the necessity of the ships. Other reasons were mentioned in the resolution and it was finally adopted.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, of which I was then a member, made a rather imperfect, in my opinion, investigation, pursuant to the resolution. The General Board of the Navy, of course, set its seal of disapproval upon the resolution and the committee followed the General Board. I was unable to agree with my colleagues and submitted a minority report in which attention was challenged to the naval situation throughout the world, the effects of the war, the wisdom of carrying forward the 1916 naval program, and the importance of bringing about a limitation of naval armaments. I am glad to say that the Congress did not follow the recommendations of the naval board and the Naval Committee. There was an insistent demand that the 1916 program should be modified. The Republican Party in its convention of 1920 had declared in favor of reduced expenditures for naval construction, and later President Harding called the Washington conference to bring about a limitation in naval armaments.

As I have stated, Great Britain and Japan, following the armistice, scrapped many ships and showed no inclination to engage in competitive naval development. Indeed, Great Britain did not lay down a single naval vessel, except one submarine, as I recall, between the armistice and the Washington conference. But in the United States the navalists and the naval board and other elements were demanding that the United States build more battleships and carry to completion the 1916 program.

In 1919 belligerent speeches were made throughout the United States, and there was constant talk of war between the United States and Japan. Speeches were made in the Senate——

Mr. NYE. Like many of those now being made.

Mr. KING. Relative to the imperative necessity of our building the most powerful navy in the world. I recall that in the Senate and in many of the newspapers of our country Japan was referred to as the nation with which we would soon be at war. In 1919 our fleet was sent from the Atlantic to the Pacific through the Panama Canal. The effect of this naval maneuver, in view of the belligerent and jingoistic talk in the United States of war in the Pacific, compelled Japan to take notice of what was occurring in the United States. Senators will recall that the Japanese Government as well as the Japanese people were greatly disturbed; indeed, they were filled with apprehension as to the purpose of the United States.

Undoubtedly the situation in the United States and the talk to which I have referred produced reactions unfavorable to peace in Japan. The result was that the Japanese Government formulated her 8–8 naval program, which called for the construction of 16 capital ships, some of which, as I recall, would have been larger than those then being constructed by the United States. Some naval writers believe that the 8–8 program when completed would have given Japan a navy as great if not greater than that provided the United States under the 1916 program. Whether this is true or not, the fact is that Japan began the execution of her 8–8 program. A little later Great Britain talked of constructing four great naval vessels of the Hood type. The situation had become by this time so acute that, as I have stated, President Harding called the Washington conference.

It may be, as some Senators have indicated, that at the Washington conference we had more cards in our hands than other nations. It may be that because we had more naval vessels on the ways and under construction the United States exercised greater influence, as the 1916 program was not in process of completion. However, I do not accept that view. Neither Great Britain nor Japan desired to increase their military burdens. The allied nations were suffering from the effects of the war. They were more interested in industrial development, in economic rehabilitation, and in furnishing food and clothing to their suffering nationals. It is urged now by some that we should project an extensive naval program upon the theory that in so doing we will have greater influence and power in any conference called to bring about disarmament or limitation of armament.

Mr. President, in my opinion our Nation should take the lead to bring about disarmament and to promote world peace. Senators have frequently referred to its wealth and power. Because it does have wealth and power it should feel the responsibility resting upon it and the solemn duty which it owes to the world. Where much is given, much is required; a nation blessed of God and secure from every danger should carry forward the standard of moral and world leadership; it should set an example for peace and so lead other nations to follow in its footsteps. In listening to this debate I could not help but feel that there was a spirit of boastfulness, because of the financial resources and wealth of the United States. It seemed to me that our fortunate situation should bring a degree of humility not a spirit of arrogance; that it should lead us to desire that our Nation should wear the crown of moral leadership, and that this Nation should be known for its attributes of justice and righteousness, which exalt a nation rather than for its physical strength and material riches.

Mr. NYE. Which is right in keeping with the argument which I now wish to make.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NYE. I will not yield for any more elaboration of these statistics at this time.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Utah has made several statements that I would like to comment on.

Mr. NYE. Then let the Senator, if they are in conflict with anything he has previously offered for the RECORD, present his statements at this time.

Mr. HALE. I simply wanted to say, Mr. President, in answer to some of the things the Senator from Utah has said—and the Senator from Utah, I know, dislikes to project himself into a debate—that I can not answer all that he has said at this time, because I can not recall everything that he has said. But he did speak about Admiral Sims and the destroyers. The Senator is quite right in stating that Admiral Sims did suggest that we use these destroyers, and he did that, presumably, after conference with the British, and it was carrying out what they wanted and was the entirely reasonable thing to do.

Mr. KING. What we wanted.

Mr. HALE. What we wanted at the time; but it left us in a somewhat involved position for the future.

The Senator has also spoken about our gambling with the lives of our men. It seems to me that the man is gambling with the lives of our men who prevents us from providing the kind of cruisers we really need for our Navy. If we do not have those cruisers, we shall have to use the cruisers we now have. America, if we get into war, will send out every ship that she can to take part in the war, and American seamen will man those ships.

Mr. NYE. Where is this war we are going to have?

Mr. HALE. I do not know. I hope that there will be no war; but if we ever do get into a war the American seamen who are sent out on these miserable old cruisers which we now have—and which we would still have to use—will have a very small chance of surviving when they get into conflict with ships of a superior size and fighting quality.

Mr. NYE. My conclusion, Mr. President, is that those cruisers will have just about as much chance as the finest type of cruiser that could be laid down.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will not yield for some comment in regard to some statistics he has given?

Mr. NYE. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. ODDIE. In connection with a comparison of the cruiser strength of this country and that of Great Britain we should not overlook the fact that Great Britain has many times more fast merchant ships than we have, which will, to a certain extent, take the place of cruisers in an emergency.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, let the Senator from Nevada offer an amendment to this bill substituting merchantmen for cruisers, and we will all join with him, and I will join with him in the argument which I am to present this afternoon.

Mr. ODDIE. I do not think that is apropos at all.

Mr. NYE. Oh, no!

Mr. ODDIE. I am citing these figures to show that Great Britain has an enormous preponderance of fast merchant ships, which could in an emergency be made into a certain class of cruisers, ships of long radius of action and great speed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURTON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NYE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I only wanted to say that the very able argument of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday was based upon the proposition that we did not care what Great Britain had.

Mr. ODDIE. I am not commenting on what the Senator from California said, but I do want it understood clearly that as we are comparing cruiser strength of the two countries, Great Britain has an enormous instrument of offense in these fast merchant ships which can be made to take the place of certain cruisers in an emergency.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. DILL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GLASS. We are selling all the merchant ships we have.

Mr. DILL. I was going to say that if we adopted the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada, we would have to adopt some sort of provision against the selling of our merchant ships as long as they are running.

Mr. NYE. Quite right, Mr. President.

The criticism which has been offered against those who have ventured to oppose this cruiser construction bill has had but one purpose in mind, and that has been to convey the thought that such opponents as there are were moved by influences which were not patriotic and by influences which were blind to the possible needs for adequate preparation to defend ourselves and defend our honor. Constantly are sarcastic references made to the so-called pacifists. If one supports the position taken by President Coolidge two years ago when he declared that our strength was ahead of that of Great Britain, then that one is a pacifist, and I presume that those who are in support of that endeavor now being made to deprive Army officers of provision for maintenance of more than one horse, thus depriving Army officers of their polo ponies, immediately become pacifists. I expect to hear the same argument a little later on.

It is a strange world; but, for my own part, I am ready to suffer such sneering criticism as is directed against those, among whom I number myself, who are unqualifiedly opposed to this program, which I have previously referred to as one of unsoundness from a moral and economic standpoint.

To my mind, the leading thought in connection with this controversy must be that one involving the occasion for and the need of a better spirit of good will than now seems to exist on the part of all the people of the world.

The nations of the world have brought about a peculiar kind of companionate marriage—armaments and peace—and this body is acting as parson to such a union in the attempt to make the cruiser bill partner legislation with the ratification of the multilateral peace treaty. It is like uniting fire and water. There are those who seem to assume that these two policies of government—the renouncing of war as a national policy and as an instrument of settling international differences, and the increasing of armaments—can exist side by side without any relation one to the other. Again, to use the physical analogy, one might as well expect fire and water not to spread, or if put into the same receptacle to keep respectfully apart.

Peace suggests compassion, trustfulness, good will, good faith, and at least reasonable forbearance. War and the instruments of hostility are supported by hate, greed, brutality, and the right of might. The Senate is trying to convince this and other nations that there is no anomaly in uniting the policies of war and peace, and, alas, many other countries have already adopted a plan of making treaties of peace while at the same time expanding their means of warfare. Since the World War this incongruity has spread until we have the spectacle of the most extensive international agreements looking toward peace and likewise the largest increase in armaments of any period in the world's history.

The entire situation reminds me of the conduct of a British divine who, after writing a pamphlet entitled "Come to Jesus," became displeased with a brother minister and wrote him a letter expressing his feelings in no uncertain terms. Before sending his epistle he showed it to a friend to get his opinion of it. The friend advised that he should put a caption on his strong, expressive letter, and when the first divine inquired what the caption should be, his friend said: "Put across the top of your letter these words, 'Go to the devil, by the author of Come to Jesus.'"

Later in this discussion I shall give the staggering figures of the burden of armaments in the different nations, including our own, countries still bowing under the cost of the recent world conflict, which amount for the United States alone, when the last sum is paid to worthy veterans, will equal, according to an estimate stated by President Coolidge, $100,000,000,000, or one-half the wealth of America when we entered this war. I shall also review the progressive moves made in recent years looking toward the assurance of permanent peace, and I shall ask the question: Are the forces promoting peace and the forces increasing armaments the same? If they are not the same, then I shall ask: Which of these groups are sponsoring the real desire of the peoples of the world? If throughout the nations the growth of armaments is not necessary to, aye, is even a great hindrance to, the progress toward lasting amity among the civilized countries, then how can this great legislative body vote for the building of 16 war vessels simply because a group interested in increasing the armaments of warfare asks that these vessels be built?

Mr. President, let us accept the possibility that the United States may need additional cruisers; are not naval heads the last group to be consulted about the extent of a naval building program? Did they not thoroughly discredit themselves as advisers in the last session of the Congress when they proposed to have the taxpayers of this peace-loving Nation dig down into their pockets to pay for the largest peace-time navy-building program ever presented to a national legislature?

They asked for 71 vessels, the initial expenditure to be $750,000,000 and the final cost around $4,000,000,000. The "bigger Navy" advocates have changed their tune, and now ask for 15 cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier. Why just this number; why not 20 vessels? They are asking not for what America may need, but for what they think they can get. I repeat that this group has discredited itself with respect to its ability or intention to present an unprejudiced analysis of the needs of our Navy. The people do not have faith in it as an unbiased advisor with regard to armaments. It is not a peace arm of the Government; it is a war arm. Navy leaders said we needed 71 vessels; now they say 16. Perhaps we should make the number 40. At least we should have a body appointed to determine the need, desire, and wisdom of adding to the United States Navy's strength without the handicap of a purely fighting tradition, a body that can take facts and weigh them in all their relationships.

To make clear that the point I am making is not personal bias as regards the attitude of the American naval leaders toward parleys for the reduction of sea armaments, let me briefly refer to their attitude with respect to such matters in recent years. When Congress in 1916 passed the Navy bill authorizing the construction of 10 first-class battleships, 6 battle cruisers, and numerous smaller ships, making a total of 113 vessels, the General Board of the Navy defined the American policy as the creation of a "navy equal to the most powerful" maintained by any nation. America was not actually in the war at this time, but the danger was imminent, and this slogan had the protection of the psychology of war that spread from the other side of the Atlantic. We entered the war the next year, and this particular program was pushed aside, while our facilities were utilized in building submarines and other types of vessels immediately required. When the war closed, the Navy had not forgotten its plan for this prodigious program earlier conceived, and the construction which would have placed the American Navy ahead of the British Navy by 1924 was resumed.

It was partly to forestall the completion of this prodigious program, the thought of which paralyzed the war-torn peoples of the world, that the Washington Limitation of Armament Conference was called in 1921. The success of this conference was not due to the naval experts of any navy; neither our own nor other naval leaders gained control of the conference. In the face of the inward wishes of the General Board of the American Navy and its purpose to make our Navy the greatest of any nation, we scrapped 30 ships, 19 of which were completed and 11 under construction. Civil officials, under the leadership of Secretary Hughes, negotiated this conference with others of their kind from other nations (Plain Talk, p. 133).

The naval experts contributed for this conference facts and figures, but stayed in their rightful places. What would have resulted at this conference had naval leaders been given full rein is indicated by what happened at Geneva two years ago at another limitation of naval armaments conference, when navy men of Great Britain and America brought a hopeless deadlock with respect to a reduction. And as if this unnecessary failure were a glory, the naval experts came forward last year with the proposal to build 71 vessels.

I reassert that this group with its ideal ever directed toward the largest American Navy possible is unfit to recommend a naval construction bill to the United States Congress. Who will deny that the bill now before us represents what the big-navy advocates were able to save from their initial program, not all they want? Their strategy and tactics mark it. In the House Naval Affairs Committee, where the extensive hearings on this measure were held, these hearings amounted to a love feast for the naval officers and their friends, and most of the time given to hearings was used by advocates of the measure, who were already here in the city and had their support well organized. The opposition, largely unorganized and not here on the ground to make known their attitude, was given little consideration until public opinion made itself felt throughout the body of Congress. Then it was that the present cruiser bill was salvaged from the wreckage.

Note the last-minute strategy applied. The original bill provided that under the event of the calling of an international conference the President might halt the construction program, but this was changed cleverly, so that under the terms of the bill which passed the House and is now before this body for action, the President may not halt the construction until after an international agreement to cut armaments has been absolutely effected. And a second addition inserted by the naval group provides that the 15 vessels be laid down 5 each year until by 1931 all would be under construction. The House has approved this, but the President disapproved it directly in that innocent-appearing phrase in his message to the present session of Congress when he said that he advocated that "the bill before the Senate with the elimination of the time clause be passed." This would take away from the standpoint of its sponsors about half of the half-loaf victory, which the measure promises to the "bigger navy" sponsors.

But whether the Navy have a fourth or a full victory with respect to the cruiser bill, I reject the proposal and ask that facts upon which to base a measure of this kind be looked at, first, by a commission of unbiased minds. Experience has proven that it did not pay to let the naval experts of the countries control the Geneva naval-cut conference. When our Navy was hopeful of its 71-vessel construction proposal, as a method of arousing public support, its author, Admiral Hughes, declared before the House Naval Affairs Committee that it was aimed at the British Navy, and Admiral Plunkett pictured the imminency of war between the two leading Anglo-Saxon nations so vividly that it called for denial by President Coolidge and denunciation by Senator BORAH, who said:

A few days ago an admiral in the English Navy put out a similar statement. If anything could possibly bring on war between two great nations it is these enlarged naval programs in connection with declarations from the navies of the respective countries that war is inevitable. This was the insane policy which obtained between Germany and Great Britain from 1900 to 1914 and was one of the great contributing causes to the World War.

Thus my first objection to the cruiser bill before us is that the wrong group created it, and it will never be free from the taints of the prejudice involved, and therefore a fresh bill from an entirely different source is fundamental in giving the American people a square deal with respect to a possible increase in the size of the American Navy.

The President, under the influence of naval officials, has shown a change of front since in his address before the American Legion at Omaha, Nebr., in 1925, he said:

In spite of all the arguments in favor of great military forces no nation ever had an army large enough to guarantee it against attack in time of peace or to insure its victory in time of war. No nation ever will.

No doubt this country could, if it wished to spend more money, make a better military force, but that is only part of the problem which confronts our Government. The real question is whether spending more money to make a better military force would really make a better country.

I would be the last to disparage the military art. It is an honorable and patriotic calling of the highest rank. But I can see no merit in any unnecessary expenditure of money to hire men to build fleets and carry muskets when international relations and agreements permit the turning of such resources into the making of good roads, the building of better homes, the promotion of education, and all the other arts of peace which minister to the advancement of human welfare.

Happily the position of our country is such among the nations of the world that we have been and shall be warranted in proceeding in this direction.

Speaking in the same tone in his message to Congress two years ago, he said:

Only one navy in the world approaches ours, and none surpasses it.

In recent months his language has implied a different attitude. In his last Armistice Day address he said:

All human experience seems to demonstrate that a country which makes reasonable preparation for defense is less likely to be subject to hostile attack and less likely to suffer a violation of its rights which might lead to war.

This hardly explains the outcome of the British and German naval expansion just before the World War. There is little doubt but the concern of their respective navies was contributory in bringing on this conflict. If the President's assertion is true, then the world owes solicitous attention to Germany, for that country under the Versailles treaty was limited to a navy of 6 small battleships, 6 light cruisers, 12 destroyers, and 12 torpedo boats, and no submarines, even for commercial uses. If this offers sufficient defense for Germany in the eyes of other nations, it is inconsistent if they provide proportionately larger naval units for themselves. Of course, the United States is not a party to the Versailles treaty, but after taking the lead in reduction of battleships, it is hardly in keeping with the spirit of that move for the Chief Executive now to say:

The size of the Navy which America is to have will be solely for America to determine; no outside influence should enlarge it or diminish it, that since there is no definite agreement to bind the United States the attitude of any other country is not to be permitted to alter our policy.

However much we ignore the attitude of other nations toward us, these will not ignore our program of naval armaments. It was the resumption of our 1916 naval program at the close of the war which led to a naval expansion by Japan and threatened the world with such an enormous competition for sea power that Secretary Hughes called the Washington Limitation Conference with its resultant victory for world peace. Whatever may be said of our independence with respect to what other nations think of our plans to increase armaments, we know well that other countries are influenced by our program and attitude.

Experience tells us that if England and America start out for sea parity in a competitive spirit that war is as likely to be the result as it was in the case of Germany and England. Because such a war is unthinkable is the greater reason why, with all the sanity we can bring to the cause, this great country, freer from the dread of conflict than any other leading power, should, by word and deed, forward world peace.

Does anyone think for a moment that the citizens of this country would have refused to shoulder the $4,000,000,000 naval building program which was the original size of the cruiser bill if there had been convincing evidence of its need? But they found that it sprang from a greed born of a desire to outstrip the British Navy. They distrusted its source. Their stand was protected by Congress. Why should it not so be with respect to the present proposal, which is the miniature saved from the original and has the same source?

Public opinion awaits justice. In a democracy such as ours, if public opinion is not sacred, what is? With regard to peace, it has won victories in these recent years but in spite of armaments. Peace agreements have usually been born enslaved, or their wings immediately clipped, and all because the peoples of the world can not command the representation which will choke off the militarism, which clings persistently to this age, and give the ideals and means of peace a fair and open chance. Their victories are barely made when along come the gods of war and wrap them in the warrior's garments. It is what the Senate is now asked to do with respect to the treaty renouncing war.

But, in spite of this condition there has been progress. Public opinion was literally on the march when a few weeks ago conflict broke out between Paraguay and Bolivia and armies which have trampled across so many paper treaties find that when the cry to halt is from an unsmothered, firm-spoken public opinion, the warring governments take heed. And it is just this vital connection between the peace agreements and the people which mark the progress. And this achievement is practically a new phenomenon in the world. Although it is yet of small stature it is no longer invisible. Witness its strength when it set itself against the Anglo-French naval agreement which was secretly negotiated and aimed at deceiving the American Government. It is the support of the peoples themselves which give vitality to treaties and agreements which mark the most outstanding advance toward permanent amity between the nations of Europe since the World War.

We have had on the Western Hemisphere in the Pan American Union a peace agency sponsored by public opinion, and for more than two decades it has worked. Now comes the Kellogg pact, which represents similar forward steps on a world-wide scale. Note what characterizes the making of these agreements. Their negotiations are open. They are not hedged about with technicalities which destroy and make obscure their meaning. Their language is simple and direct. They are no longer disguised guarantees for war. These characteristics mark them as different from the old type of agreements among nations. It is possible for the peoples of the nations to understand and support such international treaties, and they do.

The cost of armaments to-day, Mr. President, is most staggering. To indicate how really staggering it is, I ask for the inclusion in the RECORD at this point of a full-page article taken from the New York Times of Sunday, August 12, 1928, bearing the headline The Cost of Arms is $3,500,000,000 a Year. I understand that the maps and charts which accompany the article can not be reproduced, but I do ask unanimous consent to have the article itself printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the article may be inserted in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

[From the New York Times, Sunday, August 12, 1928]

THE COST OF ARMS IS $3,500,000,000 A YEAR—LEAGUE SURVEY SHOWS WORLD HAS 5,500,000 SOLDIERS, COSTING EVERY HUMAN BEING $2 YEARLY TO MAINTAIN—SEA POWER IS DECREASING, BUT NAVIES STILL HAVE 5,047,300 TONS OF WARSHIPS AFLOAT

By P. W. Wilson

In the progress toward disarmament the events of the next few weeks are bound to be important. In Paris the multilateral treaty renouncing war is to be signed by the principal powers of the world. At Geneva the preparatory commission appointed by the League of Nations to find a basis for limiting armaments is expected to resume its discussions, with the United States and Russia participating. Throughout the world there is a public opinion increasingly watchful of the progress of these long and complicated negotiations.

Of particular pertinence at this time, therefore, is the Armaments Year Book for 1927–28, just issued by the League of Nations—a complete, detailed, and authoritative survey of the armaments of the world and the cost of those armaments at the most recent available date.

The statistics of armies, navies, and aircraft, with expenditure thereon, and the particulars of munitions and of the natural resources (of importance for national defense) of the various countries are bewildering in their complexity. But there are certain facts, simple and challenging, that emerge. The cost of armaments, the number of men under arms, and the tonnage of navies can be stated with some approach to exactitude.

THE COST OF PREPARATIONS

After allowing for varying rates of exchange we may take it that the annual expenditure on preparations for war is as follows:

Armies	$2,400,000,000
Navies	1,100,000,000
Total	3,500,000,000

These approximations include aircraft, sometimes naval and sometimes military.

The total expenditure of $3,500,000,000 is equal to the entire expenditure of the United States for all purposes, including interest and repayment of debt. It is also equal to a charge of $2 a head, or $10 a family, for the entire human race, including those hundreds of millions of people in Asia and Africa to whom as yet money has scarcely a meaning.

On the other hand, it is easy to overstate the effect of disarmament on national budgets. We are often told that four-fifths or three-fourths of such budgets are due to "the cost of war."

That is true. But the heaviest cost of war in time of peace is debt, and a national debt is not directly affected by disarmament, which would deal only with current expenditure. An examination of the budgets of the world suggests that if suddenly there were to be a suspension of all expenditure throughout the world on armies and navies and aircraft and munitions the average relief to the taxpayer would amount to about one-sixth of his burden.

THE SIZE OF THE ARMIES

Let us turn next to the size of armies. Here we are warned that the statistics supplied by the various nations are the result of differing methods of computation. But a reasonable enumeration results in the broad conclusion that the number of soldiers at this moment serving their whole time with the colors is about 5,500,000.

It should be clearly understood that this figure represents only the standing armies. In addition there are the reserves, who have completed their training and what may be called civilian troops, like the National Guard in the United States and the territorials in Great Britain.

The British dominions, to give a case, maintain a permanent force of only nominal strength—3,500 for Canada—but around this nucleus there are large bodies of men who undergo what may be described as holiday training and who in an emergency would be an important factor, as the Great War demonstrated, in military operations.

The population of the world may be taken as 1,800,000,000. An aggregate standing army of 5,500,000, then, is only a little more than one soldier to every 300 civilians. This, then, is what we may call the military ratio for the human race.

In the United States the population is 118,000,000 and the standing Army is 145,000. The military ratio, to repeat our phrase, is thus little more than 1 soldier to 800 civilians. If, then, we take the United States as an example of a country which has demobilized its forces to a purely defensive standard, and if we apply this standard of 1 in 800 to the world as a whole, we find that the result would be a diminution of standing armies from 5,500,000 to 2,200,000. In other words, no fewer than 3,300,000 regular soldiers would be disbanded.

The returns to the League of Nations show that the navies of the world, taken as a whole, have been substantially reduced. In 1913 warships of all kinds were rated at 6,895,600 tons. The figure rose during the war to 7,350,400 tons. It has fallen to 5,047,300 tons—a figure which may be visualized as the equivalent of a fleet of 100 mammoth liners like the Leviathan, the Majestic, and the Berengaria.

While this reduction has been proceeding, the mercantile fleets of the world have grown from 47,000,000 tons in 1913 to 65,000,000 tons in 1927. This means that in 1913 there was 1 ton of navy to 7 tons of mercantile marine, whereas to-day there is only 1 ton of navy to 13 tons of mercantile marine.

Every day peaceful commerce is claiming a more and more absolute control of the ocean.

To sum up this general statement we may say, then, that the world is spending $3,500,000,000 for armies and navies, or about one-sixth of its aggregate of national incomes; that it is keeping approximately 5,500,000 men under arms, or 1 soldier to 300 civilians; and that it has 5,000,000 tons of naval shipping on the ocean, or 1 to 13 tons of mercantile marine. Let us now look a little more closely into these armies and navies.

The military ratio for the world is, as we have seen, 1 soldier to 300 civilians. It is a ratio that varies greatly in different countries and different continents.

First, take Latin America. Including Mexico, we have a population of 90,000,000. But an examination of 19 sovereignties shows that the armies in this area aggregate 250,000 men. To give two cases: Brazil has an army of 47,000 men and Mexico an army of 72,000. For Latin America the military ratio is 1 soldier to 360 men, or more than double that of the United States.

There is Canada with 9,000,000 citizens. She can manage with 3,500 permanent troops. But Bolivia, with 3,200,000 citizens, has 8,000 effectives, while Cuba, with 3,370,000 citizens, maintains 12,500 troops. A bright spot on the map is Panama, where national defense consists of "a general and two majors and the outlay on a military band."

Another area where the military ratio exceeds that of the United States, namely, 1 soldier to 800 citizens, is the Far East. The population of China is returned as 448,000,000. Her army is stated to be 1,600,000, which works out at 1 soldier to 280 citizens.

It is fair to add that, in many quarters, there is some measure of skepticism over this huge army or series of armies in China. But, according to the most conservative estimates, the number of troops is very large, say 1,000,000.

INDIA'S LOW RATIO

The most pertinent comparison here is with India. The population of India is 319,000,000. The standing army is 234,000, and the military ratio is thus 1 soldier to 1,363 civilians, or only one-fifth of the military ratio for China.

With a population of approximately 60,000,000 Japan has an army of nearly 200,000. Her military ratio is thus 1 soldier to 300 civilians, and, curiously, it is thus equal to the similar ratio for the world as a whole.

Indeed, there is an even more interesting comparison. Britain, on her islands, is the Japan of Europe; Japan, on her islands, is the Britain of Asia; and Japan and Britain have nearly the same military ratio. The population of Britain and Northern Ireland is 45,000,000; the standing army is 145,000; and this works out at 1 soldier to 310 civilians, or nearly three times the ratio of the United States.

The explanation of the Japanese Army is simple. China is disturbed and Russia is on the borders of China. Between the Japanese and the British Armies there are, however, two distinctions to be drawn. The Japanese soldier is a conscript, recruited for short service, and the entire manhood of the nation is thus trained for war. The British soldier is a professional, enlisted for a term of years, and he passes into a reserve, limited, therefore, in numbers.

Also, the British Army is the force reservoir for an empire of more than 400,000,000 inhabitants. As a whole, the military ratio for that empire is well within the peaceful standard maintained by the United States.

It is when we touch the Continent of Europe that we find ourselves in the area of highest military ratio.

The standing armies of Europe total nearly 3,000,000. This means that a continent with one-quarter the population of the world maintains more than one-half of the mobilized manpower.

In the armies of Europe there is manifest an immense change. Before the war the standing armies of the Central Powers were:

Germany	655,000
Austria-Hungary	400,000
Bulgaria	60,000
Total	1,115,000

Now consider the Allies. Before the war their standing armies were:

France	645,000
Russia	1,200,000
Italy	300,000
Belgium	46,000
Serbia	361,000
Rumania	98,000
Total	2,650,000

The Serbian figure, though official, must be accepted with caution. Also, the Russian Army was ill-equipped. But there was clearly a balance between two national groups.

Consider the position to-day. The armies of what used to be the Central Powers are as follows:

Germany	99,000
Austria	20,000
Hungary	34,500
Bulgaria	30,000
Total	183,500

In other words, the countries vanquished in the war have had their land forces put upon a peace footing. Conscription has been abolished and enlistment is voluntary.

IMMENSE EUROPEAN ARMIES

On the other hand, the Allies are maintaining immense armies:

France	625,000
Poland	263,000
Rumania	150,000
Yugoslavia	116,000
Czechoslovakia (approximately)	125,000
Belgium	65,000
	1,344,000
Italy	250,000
Russia (approximately)	560,000
Total	2,154,000

Over the Central Powers this represents a superiority of 8 to 1. If Britain be added, the superiority is 9 to 1.

A reason for this situation is the new political alignment. It is true that the Central Powers are disarmed. But there are two powers which stand outside what may be called the allied group. Italy has an army of 250,000 and Russia has an army which we may take to be 560,000.

In Europe, as in Latin America, the military ratio is increased by the division of the Continent into numerous sovereignties.

In 15 of the smaller independent countries of Europe there are 70,000,000 citizens. They maintain 400,000 men under arms. With 6,500,000 people, Greece—to give one instance—has an establishment of 67,000 troops; with 3,500,000 people, Finland has 28,500 soldiers. These 15 countries have no more than two-thirds of the population of the United States. Yet they have three times as many soldiers as the United States in their standing armies.

Of armies, we may then say broadly that throughout the entire English-speaking world and its dependencies, whether American or British, the military ratio is a minimum. In Latin America the ratio is higher than this minimum; in the Far East it is still higher, and in Europe the military ratio reaches its maximum. We need only add that over wide areas of the world—for instance, Africa, the Middle East, Siam, Burmah, the Malay Peninsula, and Australasia—armaments are negligible.

NAVIES OF THE WORLD

Let us now subject the navies to analysis. The League of Nations indicates precisely what has happened to sea power as the result of the war. Certain navies have been increased; others have been decreased.

Let us take the decreases first. They are, in tons:

	1913	1926	Decrease
Germany	1,030,000	151,000	879,000
Britain	2,208,000	1,184,000	1,024,000
France	683,000	529,000	154,000
Italy	337,000	295,000	42,000
Russia	339,000	125,000	214,000

The interpretation of these figures is simple. The German Navy has largely disappeared. The British have been able, therefore, to reduce their fleets by more than a million tons.

The increases are:

	1913	1926	Increase
Japan	536,000	695,000	159,000
United States	843,000	1,290,000	447,000

On paper, then, the United States has a larger—a considerably larger—Navy than Great Britain. With all navies, however, a real question, as experts know, is not aggregate tonnage, but a much more vital factor, namely, the date of the vessels in the navies. Hence, in both the United States Navy and the British there is an official allowance for what is described as depreciated tonnage; that is, one-twentieth per annum for a battleship, one-seventeenth per annum for light cruisers, and one-twelfth per annum for destroyers and submarines. For the United States Navy the depreciation is 488,000 tons. For the British Navy it is 495,000 tons. If these figures are to be accepted as conclusive, it would appear that, contrary to a very general impression, the United States Navy is, taken as a whole, as recent in construction as the British.

Here, however, it should be stated that the two British superdreadnoughts, Rodney and Nelson, with their nine 16-inch guns, twelve 6-inch guns, and 34 smaller guns, are entered as still "building," a remark which also applies to 12 cruisers of the Kent class, representing a displacement of 108,000 tons.

TONNAGE OF SHIPS FALLING

The character of navies is changing. The tonnage of battleships has been reduced from 3,897,000 in 1913 to 2,168,000 in 1926. It is a reduction not a little due to the terms and the influence of the Washington conference. The tonnage also of cruisers has fallen from 2,205,000 in 1913 to 1,191,000 in 1926.

On the other hand, the tonnage of destroyers has risen from 517,000 in 1913 to 903,000, while submarines also have developed from 95,000 tons in 1913 to 268,600 in 1926. The importance of any limitation of smaller warships is thus manifest.

The problem of armaments involves much more than the arithmetic of armies and navies. There is also what France calls "potential," namely, the animal, vegetable, and mineral resources of the various countries, the length of their coast line, the density of their population, the development of their railways, and other imponderable factors, including diplomatic commitments.

Hence, it has been maintained that the problem of limiting armaments by treaty is essentially insoluble; and the real question to-day is whether public opinion accepts such demurrers as final.

An essential factor is the growing importance of equipment. As industry is no longer manual as it used to be, but mechanical, so in a sense is fighting. A small army, well supplied with modern devices, is much more powerful than a larger army in which the equipment is merely traditional.

A measure of disarmament would be the abolition of compulsory recruiting in all its forms. This would compel all nations to enroll professional armies on terms of long service, and would limit the reserves accordingly.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, as to the United States we know the burden of war costs and national defense is on the increase. The President states that there has been an increase of $118,000,000 within the past four years. When we count the sums given to the Army and Navy we are likely to forget the additional amounts provided for in the deficiency appropriations. The last session of Congress voted in all $755,516,175 for the War and Navy Departments. Of this amount $48,000,000 was provided for the increase of the Navy. The naval craft under construction in 1929 will include two submarines and eight cruisers. Of the latter two will be completed during this year. In view of the stupendous sums paid out each year to the gods of war, our national-defense development is receiving about all the taxpayers of the country can bear or will stand. The direct cost of the War of 1812 was more than the total Federal expenditures up to that time. The direct cost of the Civil War was more than all the Federal expenditures of the Government up to the time. And since then its cost has increased 150 per cent through pensions. The cost of the World War to the United States when the last pensioner has received his last Government check will bring the total to almost triple its original cost, which has been estimated at around $35,000,000,000. Of this war burden upon the American people the Secretary of the Treasury in a recent annual report has this to say, after stating that above 80 per cent of the Federal expenditures are used to pay war bills:

> When the average citizen grumbles over the size of his income-tax payment he often visualizes his hard-earned money being spent by the Government to compile reports on business or agricultural conditions or to erect public buildings, send diplomats abroad, carry on scientific investigations, or make and enforce laws.
> As a matter of fact, a small part of the taxpayer's dollar goes into work of this sort, only about one-sixth being used for all multitudinous types of ordinary civil functions added together. One-half of each tax dollar is used for the service of the public debt, also a war bill. The remaining one-third of the taxpayer's dollar is spent in behalf of military veterans.

Between 1917 and 1923 our military expenditures totaled $18,000,000,000. A writer has shown how much this amount really is. It would pay the 679,000 public-school teachers in 271,000 schools a salary equal to twice the amount they received during this period and for the same years; it would in addition have paid the running expenses of 618 colleges and doubled the salaries of all their teaching staff; doubled the endowment of 145 colleges, which now have a $1,000,000 fund or over; and an amount would yet remain sufficient to purchase 1,000,000 homes at $4,000 each, buy the capital stock of 30,000 banks in the United States, all the stock of the telephone and telegraph companies in the United States, and leave in the bank an account of nearly a billion dollars.

No item of armaments are ever small and these expenditures sneak in unaware. Take the deficiency items. The Navy received from both deficiency appropriations for the current year $28,583,945, so that the Navy's appropriations exceeded the Budget estimates by about $2,000,000. The Navy items calling for increase in appropriations are under building construction as surface ships, aircraft, submarine bases, aircraft stations, ammunition depots, docks, and navy yards.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not mean that the naval appropriations exceeded the Budget estimate by the amount he has given. All of the items in the deficiency bill were estimated for by the Budget, if I recall correctly the circumstances.

Mr. NYE. Yes; but the naval appropriations exceeded the first estimates of the Budget Bureau.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the first estimates, but not the final estimates.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, armaments are everywhere. The American Air Service, which I wish well, is comparatively new. The leaders in aviation are desirous that this field of service contribute to world amity. Colonel Lindbergh, Commander Byrd, and others have made good-will flights. Our good-will airmen circumnavigated the globe. Since 1924 the American Congress has appropriated for the promotion of aviation a grand total of more than a half billion dollars. More than $450,000,000 of this has gone to the War and Navy Departments. The estimates for 1930 give in round numbers $6,000,000 to the aviation division of the Department of Commerce, but an amount in direct and indirect appropriations to the War and Navy Departments totaling above $100,000,000. If it is commerce and transportation and mail service we desire to promote by air routes, why do most of the funds go to the national defense branches of the Government? It is because armaments have hogged the Government and in this and other nations have become monsters which mankind is bowed in attempting to feed. Not only that these monsters have forced their psychology and viewpoint upon his bent figure and his outlook is so obscured that he thinks he has not the right even to make peace agreements with neighboring peoples without wedding his child to an armament monster.

The military burden being carried by all the people of the world is one that must be reckoned with. The increasing cost can not go on and on without inviting disaster.

It is not surprising that from all lands come murmurings of complaint by the people, and expressions of the burning desire to get away from the crushing military load.

I read, Mr. President, from a very interesting editorial published under date of January 28 by the Detroit News and Journal with the caption Must We Travel the Same Old Route?:

MUST WE TRAVEL THE SAME OLD ROUTE?

The attitude of the people of America toward the cruiser bill now before the Senate shapes up as follows: Great enthusiasm for the bill on the part of a few Senators, a few people; great enmity to the bill on the part of a dozen Senators, a few people; and great apathy toward the bill on the part of the overwhelming majority.

That apathy is easy to understand. The people have been told—so often that they believe it—that the American Navy has fallen behind the British Navy in strength, and is not very far ahead of the Japanese. They have been told that the Washington conference adopted a 5–5–3 ratio for these navies (which is not true, as this ratio applied only to capital ships) and that we are not keeping up to this ratio. They have been told that in the case of war with an enemy (unnamed and unknown), our commerce will be at the mercy of that enemy. They have been informed that the covenant of the league, the Locarno treaties, the Pan American decision to avoid war, the Kellogg multilateral treaty, are but scraps of paper, and that the only insurance of our safety lies in having a navy at least as powerful as the British.

On the other hand, their common sense tells them that they have no intention of picking a quarrel with any nation, and that we are so safe from invasion and our resources for self-maintenance are so great that no nation is at all likely to declare war on us. It tells them that even if a people should go mad with war fever, responsible ministers would scarcely dare to commit it to a conflict in the face of so many solemn covenants between so many signatories. It tells them that this continental Nation, with its few outlying possessions, has no such need of a navy as has an island power with dominions and colonies all over the world, in every continent—an island power that could be starved into submission by an effective blockade.

Common sense would tell the great majority that there is no need of a large increase in cruiser construction were it not for the vague unrest created by the advocates of the cruiser bill. There is no war; there is no enemy in sight; but would it not be better to play safe, even at the expense of several hundred million dollars? Perhaps the treaties will not hold; perhaps the pledged word of governments is not to be trusted; perhaps a combination may be formed against us; perhaps this; perhaps that.

So we shall probably pass the bill and construct more cruisers—not against Great Britain or any nation in particular, but against a cloudy eventuality. And then Great Britain will have to increase her navy—not against us, but to protect her commerce. And then Japan will have to increase hers, for is she also not an island empire? And then Mussolini will have to strengthen his, and France hers, and Brazil hers, and so on down the line. Whereupon, our Navy being again inferior, we shall have to build still more vessels, and the game begins all over again.

We saw all these things happening prior to 1914. We saw protective alliances being formed, all sorts of insurance against war being taken out, and the armament race going madly on. The result was that the insurance failed, war was created out of an already created war psychology, and for four dizzy years the world stood on the brink of general ruin. A great navy a protection? Rather it is a liability! There is far more protection in such scraps of paper as the Kellogg treaties supported by a world-wide public opinion. And that opinion exists, and was never stronger for peace than it is to-day. But it may become bewildered by preparations for war, by the adoption of an attitude of general suspicion, by imagining that the world is full of enemies waiting to strike and armed to the teeth. Let us rather have faith in the peoples, in their pledged word, and in the lessons that the recent war drove home to them.

Under these circumstances what a wonderful opportunity is America's! After years, yea, after generations, of education the people of most lands—the people of all great lands—know what occasions war, and they see it all as a thing which no well-regulated community would tolerate for a moment. Yet they are finding set up in their midst that force which constantly cries out, "Prepare!" and they are caused eternally to dig and dig and dig that there may be the wherewithal to foot the bill of preparing—funds which put in the shadow such sums as are spent for education or other worthy, forward-looking, progressive purposes; and these people know, too, that the preparation being made can eventually mean but one thing, namely, a test of strength.

Our lot in the United States is no different than that of other nations. We know that other peoples are as adverse to all talk of war and preparation for war as are we; but our Congress, like the set-up in other countries, is prevailed upon to see that Americans keep digging that we may produce, nationally, $4 for war purposes for every dollar we pay for educational or other purposes removed from militarism.

With all people dreading, as do we, the thought of more war, the drums of war, the drums of death, the drums of suffering and of pain, there stands out at this hour the pressing need for one thing, and the United States is better fitted to supply that one thing than any other nation. What is needed is not the complete abandonment of preparation for war. I shall not be one to urge or aid disarmament to the point which would leave us open to attack and defenseless. Indeed, I have already said that I believe in ample and adequate defenses. But there is sore need for some great nation like our own to make it very, very clear by its actions that it never plans to molest another nation or do more than defend itself against attack. There is need that one neighbor in this great world neighborhood afford evidence that others need not fear attack from him; that while he is prepared to defend himself against the attack of others, he is not making ready to single out a neighbor or neighbors upon whom to practice his strength.

What a wonderful opportunity is America's right now!

We can abandon this economically and morally unsound cruiser program, leave ourselves amply prepared to meet any possible attack, and convince the people of the world of our sincerity of purpose; and, setting that sort of an example, I am confident that people of other lands will quickly shame their war lords away from that purpose upon which they are constantly bent—a purpose that they will follow so long as all the world continues giving them such food for argument as we give them now if we inaugurate this cruiser program—and in the end we will find nations preparing not for war but for peace. The world but needs a moral example to be set by one great people. The world only awaits some nation to take the lead, some one people to start the ball rolling. Why not America, where our make-up is of the people of all the world, where blood and sympathies are balanced through blood and sympathies from every corner of the universe?

Some one nation must start in such a direction lest we all break and witness the very crumbling of civilization under the weight of superarmaments and the burden of the cost of supplying and maintaining them. It ought to be America. Let it be America.

Do we take a long chance by such a step? Do we jeopardize our safety or our honor by trying such a program? Not if we maintain those standards of defense which are ours to-day, and not in the present state of world unpreparedness for war. We have everything to gain and naught to lose by taking the lead in this program of abandoning preparation for offensive warfare.

Abandon or modify this cruiser program and we will at the same moment abandon talk about possible war with Great Britain or any other country, and with that loss to the militaristic cause I am confident that public sentiment in all lands would call for and cause a like program in their own countries.

Is it a dangerous step? Is it not an effort worth the try? I answer that to my own satisfaction by asking another question: How much backing would accrue to those who now urge this cruiser program upon us if England did not by her acts—in the main, the acts of her admirals—which are acts just enough to invite exaggeration through fabrications, make available some small opportunity for the fuss now made over the British Navy and naval plans? In other words, what chance would there be for this cruiser program now before us if Great Britain showed no tendency to be preparing for war away from her own shores? Why, Mr. President, in that event this cruiser program would have about as much chance of success in Congress as there is chance of the outbreak of another World War to-morrow.

Abandonment of this cruiser program, or at least postponement of it, is well worth the try. Lay it aside for a year, two years, with the express purpose of seeing what the world result might be, and if then it appears that our example is not being followed by the force of sentiment in other great nations, and first of all Great Britain, I will readily join in prevailing upon my constituency to participate in such a program as will convince the world that we mean to build to meet the most extreme sort of military emergency, and will do it knowing full well that I am aiding in a program bound eventually to rush nations again into war—a more terrible war than imagination can fathom; a war which no one will win; a war in which all participants will lose; a war bound to crush civilization; and a war which will find cruisers of about as great utility for war purposes as the toy sailboats with which the children amuse themselves in the bathtub.

Mr. President, if there is a labor problem to be met, if our shipbuilders are without work, let us appropriate means with which to build merchantmen in their yards, build things of utility which will contribute to progress and not to destruction. But let us, in any event, seize upon this opportunity which is given us as a nation to set the pace which is the only pace that can possibly win economic and moral victory of a lasting kind for all the world.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator who has just spoken if he does not think we have done what he suggests since the time of the Washington conference? We have gone ahead with practically no new construction in our Navy, hoping that we could get an agreement on limitation of armaments that would amount to something. We have practically stood still, and at the same time all of the other countries that were parties to the conference have gone ahead and greatly increased their armaments. How long does the Senator think we ought to keep that up? It seems to me we have a very good illustration of the fallacy of the argument.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, to my mind, the situation that exists at this time in Britain and here in the United States is a situation which, if we were to postpone or to abandon the program now before us, would quickly call for a like display of good will on the part of the British people—not on the part of the British Admiralty, by any manner of means, but on the part of the British people—and when that demand became ripe, when it was properly expressed, as it certainly would be expressed, in opposition and in antagonism to the program of the British Admiralty, there is no doubt in my mind but that we could seek that measure of understanding with Great Britain which would make not only unnecessary but foolish in the extreme such a program as we now have before us, voiced by some as being a program preparing for war—with whom? With Great Britain.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. While the Senator from North Dakota is considering what the Senator from Maine describes as a fallacy, I should like to have the Senator from North Dakota consider what I believe to be the fallacy of the argument of the Senator from Maine. He says that we are passing this bill, or going to pass it, not to fight anybody but to prevent war. I judge from that, if that be true, that we are liable to get into a war if we do not build more ships. Then, in the next breath, he says that since the peace conference of 10 years ago we have not built any naval vessels to speak of; and if both of those propositions be correct, the question arises in my mind, why is it that we are not in war now?

Mr. NYE. Let the Senator from Maine answer that.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, no one knows when a war may come about. I can not predict that; neither can the Senator from Nebraska. Certainly where we have held off on our building program for the last few years——

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that after holding off for 10 years we are now in danger of war?

Mr. HALE. I think we are in much more danger of war than we were before.

Mr. NORRIS. How much more? Will the Senator tell us with what country we are in danger of war?

Mr. HALE. I do not know of any particular country, but all of these other countries that have naval armaments have increased their armaments since that time.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and we have increased ours to some extent.

Mr. HALE. Very little.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator himself says that we have not done very much at it, and that is probably true; but he wants now to build a lot of warships to keep us out of war.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is a true theory, then when we do not build warships it must follow that we get into war, and I am wondering why we have not gotten in.

Mr. HALE. Not of necessity that we must get in, but that we may get in.

Mr. NORRIS. And we may get in if we build more.

Mr. HALE. No; we are much more likely not to get in if we are strong.

Mr. NORRIS. That was the experience of Germany and Great Britain. They both built, and they both got into war.

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It was the nations that had navies that got into war, whereas, if the Senator's theory is true, the nations that had navies would not have been in war, and the nations that did not have navies would have done the fighting.

Mr. HALE. And if Great Britain had not gone into the war what would have happened to the rest of the world?

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I am not a prophet, if the Senator wants to ask me.

Mr. HALE. There is very little question what the German fleet would have done if Great Britain had not gone to war.

Mr. NORRIS. The fact remains that neither Great Britain nor Germany would have been in the war had they not both been armed to the teeth.

Mr. BARKLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED of Missouri. With the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Rear Admiral Fiske in the February number of Plain Talk, which I think affords some very interesting information. I believe, in view of the great reputation and character of the author, the article is well worthy of the study of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Rear Admiral Fiske printed in what is known as Plain Talk for February. Is there objection? Consent is given.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From Plain Talk, February, 1929]

HOW BRITISH GUILE SCUTTLED THE AMERICAN NAVY

By Rear Admiral Bradley A. Fiske, United States Navy, retired

[We all know that following the Great War, we actually had, counting ships under construction, the greatest Navy in the world, and that we abandoned the construction of many capital ships through agreement with other powers, chiefly England. We know that England, keeping the limitations treaty to capital ships, is now asking superiority in cruisers. This article shows how we were duped. Admiral Fiske, foreseeing depredations on our merchant marine by England and Germany alike, fought for a larger Navy until his retirement. After we got into the Great War we started the preparations that he had unsuccessfully urged, but at the cost of a year's delay and a consequent cost in lives and dollars that is incalculable. It is something to think about]

The pictures of Uncle Sam have always shown him as a typical Yankee, tall and lank, with a humorous but exceedingly shrewd expression about the eyes. Doubtless, he was shrewd in settling the domestic questions that concerned him most in his younger days; but he has not always been shrewd in international affairs and when the World War broke out on August 1, 1914, he was given a perfect opportunity for exercising shrewdness and failed to seize it.

On that day the General Board of the Navy sent in a long letter to the Secretary of the Navy, pointing out the various dangers to our peace that a war between the world's two greatest sea powers made inevitable—especially those dangers inseparable from questions of neutrality—and urging that immediate and adequate steps be taken to prepare the Navy to defend our neutral rights, etc. In many conferences which I had with the Secretary of the Navy after this, I (as his virtual chief of staff) urged him to follow our advice. I pointed out that a state of adequate preparedness on our part would not tend to involve us in the war, but would act in the contrary way, because then the belligerent nations on each side would be sedulous to enlist us on their side, if possible, and extremely careful to refrain from any actions that might provoke us and cause us to take part on the other side.

Had the Navy's advice been followed, Germany would have made every effort to gain and hold the sympathy and support of a Nation that was able to throw a deciding force into the scale on either side and certainly would not have been so unwise as to sink the Lusitania, with many prominent Americans on board, or to torpedo our merchant vessels. And we should not have been given any compelling cause for entering the war. The European nations would have settled their quarrel much sooner than they did, though not, of course, until they were exhausted, both militarily and economically. As a further result, only one nation on the earth would have remained great and prosperous—the United States.

But Uncle Sam rejected the Navy's expert advice. He flatly refused to prepare at all and yet tried to carry on sea commerce as a neutral with both sides. As the General Board had predicted, dangerous questions as to breaches of neutrality very soon came up. These, at first, were with Great Britain, because of her seizing our merchant ship in and near the English Channel, under charges of breaches of neutrality and violations of blockade, sending them into British ports for examination and holding them there for what seemed to us long periods of time.

However, when we entered the war it was on her side. The reason, of course, was that Germany, overestimating our degree of unpreparedness and the extent of the pacifistic nonresistance into which President Wilson had beguiled our people, adopted a policy of unrestricted submarine warfare and sank some American merchant ships without previous warning or subsequent assistance. Subjected thus to continual and grave injuries and insults (because we were deemed too weak to resent them), America finally plunged headlong into a war 3,000 miles away, which we had had no hand in causing, for which we were dangerously unprepared, and in which we had had, at first, no real or material interest.

It has been said by many people not conversant with naval strategy that we did have an acute material interest in the outcome of the war because, if Germany had conquered Britain and the rest, she would then have come across the Atlantic and conquered us. But the United States Naval War College would tell you the reverse. Germany could not possibly have done this; that is, if our Navy had been prepared.

Of course, it would have been a "selfish" policy to let the European nations commit suicide together while we sat by, shrewdly observant and peacefully secure in our neutral rights, behind the shelter of our guns. But intelligent selfishness sometimes results more advantageously for everybody than unintelligent altruism. Surely it must be clear to anybody now that it would have been far better, at least for the United States, if it had acted as any other nation in the world would have acted and had let the nations who were having a perfectly natural quarrel about business matters settle their quarrel in their own way.

When America finally entered the war it entered with all the ardor of a youthful though untrained fighter. Our service was so effective that it rescued the side that would otherwise have been overwhelmed.

Of course, our unprepared condition made us late in entering the war. One might suppose that the side which we rescued would forgive us for this. It did not. Probably it would have done so if it had not conceived the notion that it was Uncle Sam's duty to assist and that only blame should attach to us for our slowness. We of the United States may think such a frame of mind unreasonable and that the Allies should be thankful to us that we rescued them at all.

But such a feeling on our part would seem unreasonable to anyone who understands even a little of the elements of human nature, for the simple reason that it is unreasonable to expect either nations or individuals to hold an unbiased view of any question in which their own interests are involved.

But whether the view of the Allies after the war was unreasonable or not, it seems to be a fact that they did take that view. Furthermore, the superskillful statesmen of Great Britain made a very large fraction of the people of the United States take it. Many of our papers and many of our statesmen were eloquent in broadcasting the idea. Closely connected with this idea, also eloquently broadcast, was the idea that wars were 100 per cent bad and that the best way to preserve peace was for all the nations to limit their armament. After a few years of the spreading of this idea, the United States invited the great maritime nations to a conference on limitation of armament.

At that time our Nation was the most powerful in the world not only economically but navally, for we possessed the actual and potential factors that constituted a navy far more powerful than any other. It was not unreasonable that this should be the case; not only because our country was then the richest in the world but also because we had wisely conserved its riches and built up its Navy at great cost. And there was a further reason, which was the fact that the progress of the world had isolated this Nation and had made it the perfectly natural target for the perfectly natural envy and jealously of all the other nations. To imagine that such a position would not have made it such a target is to imagine human beings as being very different from what they really are.

That our Government conceived the idea of the limitation of armament conference in its own mind and proposed it of its own initiative is the prevalent impression. The fact is that it closely followed the receipt of information by our Government that the British cabinet was ready to abandon the old 2-power stand and to welcome the American Navy to "equality" with the British!

But even if that nation did make the suggestion and even if she did, in cooperation with her ally Japan, bring about the decision that was ultimately made, such an action should not cause bad feeling on our part toward them. We should merely smile and realize that it was the duty of the statesmen of Great Britain and Japan to do whatever they could for the prosperity of their nations. Their loyalty and honor were due to their mother countries and not to us.

The three major nations in the conference were the United States, Great Britain, and Japan. Of these three, Great Britain and Japan were at the time actual allies and had been actual allies for 20 years. The conference, therefore, was really between two parties. One party was the United States, the other party was the two allies—Great Britain and Japan. The natural result was that the decision was to the disadvantage of the United States and to the advantage of Great Britain and Japan.

The major parts of the decision were two in number.

One part was the voluntary abnegation by the United States of her naval superiority over Great Britain and Japan, a substitution of parity with Great Britain and a 5 to 3 ratio with Japan.

The other major part of the decision was an agreement by the United States not to make any further improvements in the defenses of the Philippine Islands or to increase their capacity as a naval base.

Referring to the parity between Britain and the United States, the decision involved parity in only battleships and airplane carriers. The discussions preceding the decision indicated a willingness on the part of Britain to include parity in other classes of ships, but for reasons that need not be mentioned now the only parity to which the three countries agreed in writing was parity in battleships and airplane carriers. There has been considerable said since then in American newspapers as to the "principle" underlying the agreement, but in fairness we ought to admit that any such talk is very vague and is subject to numerous misunderstandings and that the only things to which the three nations committed themselves were those to which they signed their names. Clearly the loose talk which some Americans have indulged in concerning the "principles" of the agreement and the oral remarks which Mr. Balfour and others made have nothing to do with the case any more than have any of the oral discussions which have preceded any business agreement in ordinary business life.

The 5 to 3 ratio regarding Japan, most people not conversant with naval strategy have accepted as being fair and reasonable, on the theory that such a ratio represented the approximate ratio between the resources of the United States and Japan. But this reasonableness is only apparent. It is not real, for the simple reason that in any war between this country and Japan our fleet would have to go out to Japan, 7,000 miles away from our bases in the United States and very close to the bases of Japan, and accept a strategic disadvantage so great that the 5 to 3 ratio is not anywhere near great enough to permit our fleet to fight with any reasonable prospect of success.

As to the second major part of the decision—this has impressed our people very much less than has the numerical reduction of our fleet; and yet it is immeasurably more important. Our agreement not to defend the Philippines serves the double purpose of making it very easy for Japan to capture them and almost superhumanly difficult for us to recapture them. That the value of these considerations is thoroughly apreciated by the British and Japanese will be easily realized.

It is necessary to bear in mind that the British and Japanese were actual allies when the conference was held and had been allies for virtually 20 years and that the Japanese had at least two powerful naval bases in Japan, while the British had decided to build a powerful naval base at Singapore. By looking at any map, it can be seen that the "communications" of these two allies in the East lay between Singapore and Japan and that our naval base at Manila flanked those communications.

By two military countries, such as the British and the Japanese preeminently are, such a situation could not be regarded with indifference, because in case of war with us it would constitute a military danger, while in time of peace it constitutes a permanent vantage point in commercial dealings.

For both peace and war, therefore, it was highly desirable for Britain and Japan to get rid of our naval base at Manila. At that time the naval base there was extremely weak, holding as it did only one small floating dry dock. But the far-sighted statesmen of Britain and Japan, visualizing the certain increase in the value of China for their sea commerce, realized that if the United States should make Manila a real naval base, it might prove extremely troublesome to the line of communications between Japan and Singapore.

In order to induce us to emasculate it the Japanese first effected the ruse of preparing their navy for war and then insisted that they would not sign any agreement at all unless we agreed not to increase the defense of the Philippines or their capacity as a naval base. Their pretense was that any increase of defense there would menace the security of Japan. Yet Japan was more than a thousand miles away and flanked all lines of communication between the United States and the coast of Asia.

After the decision of the conference had been published in 1922, the people of the United States acclaimed it, because they had been led to believe that it was a great triumph of statesmanship.

It would have been a great triumph of statesmanship if the following statement of Secretary Hughes had been correct:

"This treaty ends—absolutely ends—the race in competition in naval armament. At the same time it leaves the relative security of the great naval powers unimpaired."

But that statement was wholly incorrect. As to the first sentence in it, anyone who reads the newspapers knows that the decision did not end "the race in competition in naval armament." He knows that all it ended was (by the terms of the decision itself) the competition as to battleships and airplane carriers. He knows that the race in all the other factors of naval armament is proceeding as keenly as before. Anybody with even a moderate knowledge of naval strategy would have known in 1922 just what the General Board told Mr. Hughes that this would inevitably happen.

As to the second sentence in the statement of Secretary Hughes, it is equally incorrect. Before the decision the United States was fairly secure in the Philippines and she had started to make herself wholly secure by the simple and inexpensive process of equipping the Philippines with enough airplanes, submarines, etc., to prevent an enemy from disembarking from his ships in open boats, proceeding to the shore in those open boats, and landing from those boats on the shores of the island. But the decision rendered the islands helpless before any determined foe. Was our "relative security unimpaired?" If you had valuables in a safe-deposit vault, guarded by armed watchmen, and equipped with locks, would you feel that the security of those valuables was "unimpaired" if the watchman and time locks were removed?

Mr. Hughes's statement being wholly incorrect, the decision of the conference, instead of being a great triumph of statesmanship, was a great blunder of statesmanship.

It should be clearly understood that no member of the American delegation was a Navy officer. One would naturally suppose that in a conference in which the whole subject of discussion was one that hinged on the relative values of naval units there would have been at least one member who understood those relative values. It had been suggested that at least one Navy officer should be a member. But this suggestion was rejected, and not only did the delegation contain no Navy officer, but the civilian delegates, during all their discussions, paid little heed to the advice of Navy officers, and in their final decision went flatly counter to it. The General Board did all in its power to prevent the American delegates from making the decision which they did, a decision which every intelligent man in the world, who is unbiased and knows the facts, now realizes was worse than a crime; it was a blunder.

Yet press and pulpit vied with each other in praising it. One of the editors of a prominent American magazine declared it to be the most beneficent incident in the progress of the human race since the coming of Jesus Christ. Much, if not most, of the reason for this was the superskillful propaganda coming from England and the associated fact that the publicity relative to the British activities which was given out in Washington to the newspapers was given to them at the British Embassy by an Englishman, Lord Riddell. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 22, 1922, states:

"Mr. Wickham Stead, editor of the London Times, in a recent speech quoted in the Montreal Statesman, stated the following:

"'The American delegates refused to give out any news during the conference. They left the whole matter with the British publicity agent, Lord Riddell.'"

When one looks back now and realizes the state of feeling in the United States at that time one can see that our people, including the Secretary of State and his colleagues of the delegation, had been propagandized into a condition so emotional as almost to constitute psychosis.

Not long after a bill was presented to Congress for carrying into execution the details of the limitation. It was presented by Mr. Butler, the chairman of the House Naval Committee. It was passed almost unanimously. In the Senate only one man voted against it—Senator France.

The situation since has been made immeasurably worse by the fact that, while we have bound ourselves not to make any improvements whatever in our feeble little base at Manila, Britain has proceeded with characteristic British determination and thoroughness to complete her naval base at Singapore at a cost of at least $35,000,000. There is no pretense whatever that this base is anything but a naval base. The British do not pretend that it is a commercial base or a base for the propagation of the Gospel, or for any other purpose whatever, except the use of force whenever ability to take advantage of the use of force may seem to them desirable.

It must be plain to any intelligent person now that the present situation was brought about as the result of proper foresight and persuasive ability on the part of the British and Japanese at the conference in Washington, combined with an amazing lack of foresight and a fatuous credulity on the part of our American delegates. Nowhere in history can there be found an equal lack of common sense on the part of any men of equal national standing, intrusted with their country's safety. The foresight shown by the British and Japanese was really not extraordinary, for many similar examples can be found in history. Their foresight and persuasiveness appear extraordinary merely because we see them against the background of the extraordinary ineptitude of the Americans.

In order to visualize the situation correctly, it is essential to clear away the "bunk" that beclouds it and realize that the great nations of the earth are essentially business firms. They are the most powerful business firms in the world. The directors of these great business firms are called governments.

In carrying on their relations with each other all governments have two main official agencies, diplomacy and war. Diplomacy is conducted by the State Department and war by the Army and Navy. Like all other business organizations, governments have many mutual and common interests and many reasons for refraining from strife. To effect their peaceful purposes they employ diplomacy, an agency of great antiquity. With the progress of civilization this agency has been continuously and increasingly developed, until now in every civilized country it constitutes a veritable machine.

So long as this machine operates successfully between any two countries, their mutual relations proceed satisfactorily and they remain at peace. But every man-made machine is subject to derangement, and the diplomatic machine is no exception to this rule. When the diplomatic machine finally breaks down, the two nations involved, being separate and independent sovereigns and having no common superior to direct them or any code of enforceable law to appeal to, have no means of settling their dispute except war.

The ends that could be achieved by war, however, have often been achieved by diplomacy. This being adequately realized by all the great nations except the United States, those nations have created diplomatic organizations just as carefully selected, as finely trained and as reliable in every way as the Army and Navy. It was by reason of the excellence of her diplomatic machine that Britain secured, at the conference in 1921–22, an advantage so great that it has been aptly termed "Britain's greatest naval victory." It wiped out the United States as the principal rival of Britain on the sea and perpetuated Britain's mastery on the sea to a degree that Americans do not realize. Mr. Balfour was promptly created an earl and a Knight of the Garter. The reward was wholly inadequate to his deserts. There was no reward possible on this earth that would have been even approximately adequate for a triumph of diplomacy so magnificent and complete, so clearly implicit in the assurance of the perpetuation of Britain's empire on the sea.

Although we had voluntarily sacrificed our safe position on the sea, yet Congress failed, in the years that followed, to keep the Navy up even to the low strength decided on. Britain and Japan, on the contrary, went strenuously ahead and built their navies up increasingly, with the result that, relatively, we kept falling more and more behind. This condition naturally alarmed our Navy officers; but the mental condition of the country was such that our people could not be made to see the future dangers which the situation was developing. Finally, however, Navy officers were able to make the authorities realize that, in one particular at least, the danger was very clear. This danger was the fact that Britain, Japan, and the other nations were building a large number of cruisers of great speed and steaming radius, which, in case of war, could exercise the double function of preying on our commerce and acting as scouts for their own fleets; while we were doing nothing whatever in the matter.

The result of all the agitation was that a further conference was called at Geneva, which, after a preparatory conference, met in June, 1927. Our idea in bringing about this conference was to have the same kind of limitation apply to cruisers and other kinds of vessels that had been applied by the Washington conference to battleships and airplane carriers.

Before the conference met, I naturally had talks with many Navy officers about it. Not one officer to whom I talked had the slightest notion that we could accomplish anything. Of course, we did not. How could any sane person who understood the situation believe that Great Britain would yield to our suggestion? Obviously, if she had yielded, she would have sacrificed part of the advantage that she had gained over us. It was represented by us that the "spirit of the conference" in Washington in 1922 had been that the ratio decided on should apply to all classes of warships.

But what did that have to do with the case in 1927? The British delegation attended the conference in 1927, charged with the responsibility to their government of furthering the interests of their country. Why should they neglect that responsibility and play into the hands of a rival country? The only possible reason that could be advanced was that the United States had done what she had in 1922. But would any business man in New York, engaged in any "deal" with a rival business man, agree to make a fool of himself simply because his rival had made a fool of himself five years before?

The main single contention at Geneva in 1927 was concerned with large and small cruisers. The British delegates, in the discharge of their responsibilities to their country, endeavored to induce the American delegates to consent to limiting the size of cruisers and their guns to dimensions too small for the purposes of the American Navy, which virtually has no bases and no merchant ships that could be readily converted into warships. Such dimensions, of course, were perfectly suitable for the British Navy, because it has many bases and a multiplicity of great merchant ships easily convertible into warships.

After the Geneva conference broke up without coming to an agreement, an instructive thing happened in the United States. If ever our Government showed conclusively its utter lack of shrewdness in international affairs, it was when it exhibited a tremendous disappointment over the lack of agreement. As to the people themselves, they displayed actual resentment against the American delegates, because they had failed to agree to the British proposals! Many of the greatest newspapers in this country concentrated their wrath on the Navy officers on the delegation, and declared that the next time such a conference was to be held, we should be very careful that no admiral should take part in it. Can anyone imagine a state of mind more stupid?

The principal outstanding fact of international importance since the so-called "failure" of the Geneva conference was the speech in our House of Representatives made by Mr. Butler, in which he deplored the fact that he, himself, had introduced the bill cutting down our Navy and declared frankly that he and all the rest of Congress had been "fooled." This statement was exactly true; and the fact that we all had been fooled is now admitted by a large section of our people. There are, nevertheless, very many people and very many great newspapers that hold virtually that our delegates to the conference of 1921–22, instead of being fooled, acted in the noblest and wisest manner possible.

It is obvious that we are dropping still farther behind, even in the ratio in power decided on in 1921 and 1922. That Congress should have permitted this is not at all surprising. It is the kind of thing that Congress usually has done, a trait that English diplomats perfectly realized.

It has finally come about that the United States is in a situation at once ridiculous and dangerous. With the purest intentions in the world, we have allowed ourselves to be cajoled into giving up not only our naval supremacy on the sea but also the only considerable base we had in all the world, the Philippine Islands. For let us realize frankly that our agreeing not to increase the wholly inadequate defenses of the Philippine Islands has made it not only possible but easy for Japan to capture them whenever she wishes.

Let us look at the map again, and realize that that long stretch of China coast offers the most tempting opportunities in all the world for the sale of manufactured goods; that Britain and Japan have realized this for many years and have acted in accordance with that realization; that Britain and Japan came to an agreement at the start of the century which resulted in a formal alliance; that, although that formal alliance was canceled in 1922 as part of the agreement of the Limitation of Armament Conference; yet, nevertheless, the same conditions of mutual interests which brought about the alliance persist and, so long as those mutual interests persist, no formal alliance is essential. Let us also realize that Japan has powerful bases at one end of the line that runs along the east coast of China and that Britain will shortly have a tremendous naval base at the other end.

Let us realize that we are committed to the policy of the open door in China, and that this policy is contrary to the interests of Great Britain and Japan. This being the situation, is it not plain, in case of those conflicts of interest which continually occur in foreign trade, that we should be tremendously handicapped if we tried to insist on our rights as against those of the allies? How can we profitably insist on anything when we have no means with which to back up our insistence? Let us not forget, in case of a conflict of vital interests regarding matters in eastern Asia between us on the one hand and the allies on the other, that there will be no court competent to decide the matter and no policemen to enforce the decree of the court, even if there were such a court. Each state holds itself sovereign.

It may be objected that Japan's interests lie with Russia rather than with England; that Germany, Russia, and Japan will constitute a coalition which will dominate the world in the proximate future. Perhaps they will, but certainly they do not now; and until they do, if ever, it must be clear that Japan will fear Russia more than she will fear any other country, for the same reasons that she feared her in 1904, and the last thing she will want to lose will be the support of the British fleet.

It may be objected that this article is materialistic and takes no account of the teachings of Christianity. Possibly. But I should like to have some one point out an instance where any nation, in its relation with other nations, has not acted according to the materialistic methods which Americans themselves follow in their private business dealings with each other—with the single exception of the United States in the case under discussion. No people can surpass the Americans in shrewd business dealings with each other; and yet no other nation has ever approximated the childish faith in human nature which Americans as a nation show in European nations. We, as the richest nation in the world, the nation becoming richer still and with amazing speed, are so absorbed in making money that we fail to realize that other nations may not look at many matters as we do. The very fact of our absorption in money making shuts our eyes to what other nations may be doing. But it makes other nations open their eyes to what we are doing, and it tempts them to ask themselves if they can not, by guile or force (or by guile and force), get some of the money that they think we are making.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I had not intended to consume any of the time of the Senate in a discussion of this measure, because it seems to me that some effort ought to be made to dispose of the measure in order to give proper consideration to other important bills that await our attention. However, as this debate has progressed I have felt that a candid expression of the viewpoint of each Senator here might be beneficial in clearing away some evident misapprehensions which seem to surround the consideration of this whole matter of naval construction and equipment.

In the first place, I desire to make my own position clear. Unfortunately, in this as in other controversial questions there are extremes on both sides. There are those who would plunge our country into an extravagant and unnecessary prodigality of expenditure for naval and military equipment without regard to either necessity or propriety. On the other hand, there are some who would abolish, even under present conditions, all semblance of preparation for resistance to encroachments upon our territory or our rights by any nation whatsoever. I do not belong to either of these groups. I believe in peace. I have supported to the best of my ability every movement that held out any hope of future permanent peace among the nations of the earth, and I am prepared to follow that course in the future.

I am not unmindful of the fact that we must consider the conditions of society as they are and not as we might wish them to be. I feel that in the consideration of our duty in a matter of the nature and scope of national defense we must keep in mind both our longing for peace and our obligations to the people of our own country in their pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness.

We have often said, and it can not be too often repeated, that we want nothing that belongs to any other nation or people except their good will and friendship. We do not want their territory. We do not wish to deprive them of any right to which they are entitled as members of the family of nations. We desire and court the same sentiments toward us from all the other nations of the world. This feeling, not only on our own part but, as I believe, on the part of practically all other nations, was recently manifested by the negotiation of the Kellogg-Briand multilateral treaty renouncing war as an instrument of national policy and pledging one another not to resort to any but pacific means to settle international controversies.

As between the peace pact and the cruiser bill, I voted to give the peace pact first consideration, because I believe the time has arrived in the affairs of the world—in fact, it arrived long ago—when peace should be given the first chance to work out the problems which trouble the nations of the earth.

When the Washington disarmament conference had concluded its deliberations and a treaty was signed fixing the 5–5–3 standard for the navies of Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, respectively, it was the general belief among the people of America, if not of the other nations, that competition in naval construction among the three great naval powers of the world was at an end. It was hailed as the dawn of a new day of real disarmament, and it was believed that this great controversy was well on its way to permanent settlement. It would not be fair to intimate or leave the impression that this great conference failed to accomplish a long and valuable step in that direction. In the matter of what are known as capital ships among the respective navies I think it can be truthfully said that a great step was taken in the direction of permanent disarmament, though it probably ought also to be said that the capital ship in the intervening years since then has become relatively less important as a part of any navy than it had been prior to that conference.

However, there were certain important fields in naval construction and equipment with which the Washington conference did not deal, or at least which were not included in the limitations fixed by the treaty then negotiated. One of these has to do with the construction and maintenance of cruisers, which is the important subject covered by the bill now under consideration. Every nation signatory to that treaty can build any number of cruisers which it wishes or can afford to build without violating the terms of that treaty.

There seems to have been an unnecessary amount of confusion created and misinformation disseminated concerning the relative cruiser strength of the three great naval powers of the world—Great Britain, the United States, and Japan. And likewise there has been an undue amount of dispute and confusion as to the relative needs of these nations not only for cruisers but for all characters of naval vessels and equipment.

I do not understand why in a debate of this sort it has been so difficult to arrive at the real facts about the strength not only of the navies involved in capital ships under the Washington treaty but in their respective strength with reference to the cruiser situation with which we are trying to deal in this legislation.

I wish to call attention to what I deem authentic information upon this subject obtained from an impartial source and not colored by any fantastic fears or ambitions on the part of any group or interest.

The following table gives the number of modern cruisers already built by the three nations, United States, Great Britain, and Japan:

Attention to the fact that the ratio in tonnage of modern cruisers built, building, and about to be built is not the Washington conference ratio of 5–5–3, but 1.8 for the United States, 5 for the British Empire and 2.5 for the Japanese Empire.

The following table makes a comparison of the modern cruiser strength of the three respective nations referred to:

Modern cruiser strength compared

	United States		Great Britain		Japan
	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage	Number	Tonnage
Modern cruisers completed with guns less than 8-inch caliber	10	66,000	49	246,776	21	98,015
Modern cruisers completed with 8-inch guns			7	70,000	5	38,400
Modern 8-inch gun cruisers building	8	80,000	8	76,600	6	60,000
Modern 8-inch cruisers about to be laid down			2	16,600	1	10,000
Total modern 8-inch cruisers	8	80,000	17	163,200	12	108,400
Total modern cruisers of all calibers built and building	18	146,000	60	409,976	33	206,415

It will be seen that the United States now has only 10 modern cruisers in service in the Navy, with an aggregate tonnage of 66,000; while Great Britain has 56 modern cruisers in service in her navy, with a total aggregate tonnage of 316,776; and that Japan has 26 modern cruisers in her navy with an aggregate tonnage of 136,415. These modern cruisers of the United States have a total of 120 guns, those of Japan have a total of 169 guns, and those of Great Britain have a total of 339 guns.

The number of modern cruisers now being built by the United States is 8, aggregating 80,000 tonnage; the number being built by Great Britain is 8, with a total tonnage of 76,600, with 2 about to be laid down, aggregating a tonnage of 16,600; and the number being built by Japan is 6 with an aggregate tonnage of 60,000.

Therefore, the United States has built and building, 18 modern cruisers aggregating a tonnage of 146,000; Great Britain has built and building, 60 modern cruisers with a total tonnage of 409,976; and Japan has built and building, 33 modern cruisers with a total tonnage of 206,415.

In other words, at present Great Britain has more than five times as many modern cruisers in use as the United States, with five times the total tonnage; while Japan has now in use more than twice as many cruisers as the United States and more than twice the tonnage.

It has been claimed that instead of having only 10 cruisers now in use the United States has 32 in the service. But in order to arrive at this figure it is necessary to include 22 old cruisers, all of which are obsolete, the newest of which is more than 21 years old and the oldest is 36 years old. These old vessels are of practically no value in warfare, and are not entitled to be counted in comparison with modern cruisers either in our own or in other navies.

It is an interesting fact, not generally known, and I have no doubt will be surprising to learn, that from 1908 to 1923 the United States did not build a single cruiser to be added to our Navy.

It is not necessary to draw any invidious comparisons in order to arrive at the conclusion that because we are undertaking in this bill to authorize the construction of 15 additional cruisers, in view of the fact that now we only have 10 with a total aggregate tonnage of 66,000, Great Britain having a total of 56 with over 316,000 tons, that we are necessarily building in competition with Great Britain or that a war, either imminent or remote, with that great country is in prospect.

We have in the course of construction 8 additional cruisers, so that we have already building and under construction a total of 18, aggregating a total tonnage of 146,000. Therefore after we complete the 8 cruisers now under construction, making a total of 18 modern cruisers, we will only have a total of 146,000 tons compared with 316,000 tons now possessed by Great Britain of cruisers which are already in use.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. These programs of construction on the part of the nations to which the Senator has just referred proceeded while the United States was standing absolutely still and doing no construction in respect to cruisers.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is practically correct.

So that not only now are we less equipped with cruisers than Japan, but after we finish the 8 now under construction, and after Great Britain finishes the 8 she is building, and Japan finishes the 6 she is building, we will still be very far below Japan in cruiser strength. So that by comparison of the three navies from the standpoint of cruiser strength in total tonnage and in total guns we are third in rank among the three great maritime nations of the world.

We know the average age for efficient use of a cruiser of this type is 20 years. We also know it requires an average of about five years to build one of such cruisers.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I want to emphasize the fact the Senator has just brought out. As I understand it, if a passenger-carrying ship were 25 to 30 years old, it would be considered very questionable whether it would be safe to continue it in use, and yet they want 22 cruisers, the average age of which is 25 years, to be manned with sailors and seamen when it is hardly permitted to carry passengers on a vessel that old. The average age of these cruisers is 25 years, and if one of them should be sent out and anything happened to it, the people who now criticize the pending cruiser bill would be denouncing the Navy for its dereliction in using such ships.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I only desire to say that I am surprised at the Senator's moderation.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is surprised at anybody's moderation these days. There is none of it here at home.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am curious to know who "they" are. Who are demanding that these 25-year-old ships be manned?

Mr. SWANSON. Some of the pacifists in the country. I did not hear the Senator's speech. If he advocates it, he is making a mistake.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If he is!

Mr. SWANSON. I hope he is not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Up to the present time he is not. I was merely curious to know who it was the Senator referred to as wanting such ships used.

Mr. SWANSON. Some Senators have used those ships in trying to show the strength of the American Navy. I think the Government would be derelict in its duty—indeed, it would be almost criminal—if it were to take ships with an average age of 25 years and send them into the line of battle.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think most of us would agree with the Senator, but I was curious to know who those people are who urge doing any such thing.

Mr. SWANSON. We have heard estimates made in the Senate including those ships as a part of the American Navy, and comparing the American Navy, including those ships, with the British Navy and the Japanese Navy.

I hope the Senator from Montana will be frank enough to say those ships ought to be excluded. I hope the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] will also be frank enough to say those ships ought to be excluded from any estimate of the relative strength of the American Navy, the British Navy, and the Japanese Navy.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think the Senator heard that statement in the Senate. He has it confused with outside voices.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will read some of the speeches made in the Senate where an effort was made to compare the relative strength of our Navy with the navy of Great Britain, he will see that I am correct. Some Senators have said that we have as many cruisers as Great Britain. The only way that result can be arrived at is to include the 22 old cruisers to which I have referred. The Senator said they ought to be excluded.

Mr. BORAH. Who said that?

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Idaho said they ought to be excluded. He would not send anybody out in a 25-year-old ship to fight in the American Navy for our country.

Mr. BORAH. I thought the Senator a while ago had me including them.

Mr. SWANSON. I say they ought to be excluded.

Mr. BORAH. Now, the Senator is right.

Mr. BARKLEY. I hope all this extraneous debate is not going to be excluded.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the next time a Senator undertakes to make a comparison between the American Navy, the Japanese Navy, and the British Navy, he will not include those 22 cruisers having an average age of 25 years. If any Senator does that I hope the Senator from Montana or the Senator from Idaho will rise in his place and say they ought to be excluded.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am still curious to know what Senator did include them.

Mr. SWANSON. All the estimates I have seen have shown that they were included.

Mr. BARKLEY. One of the reasons why I injected the old cruisers into the discussion was because a few days ago, during the address of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], when he took the position that the 15 cruisers now proposed were for replacement purposes, he was asked to name the cruisers they were to replace. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] had inserted in the RECORD the names and ages of the 22 cruisers to which I have referred. Then, the Senator from Montana stated that they had been replaced so many times that he wondered when we were going to cease replacing those identical cruisers; when as a matter of fact we only have 10 cruisers now in operation and only 8 cruisers in the yards under construction, and if the 8 were finished we would have only 18, so it could not be contended that the 22 old ones replaced any that are now in use.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Did the Senator refer to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I referred to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

An effort has also been made to create the impression that we are and have been for some time engaged in a race or competition with Great Britain, not only in battleship construction, but in cruiser construction. I think when we consider the fact that for 15 years, from 1908 to 1923, we did not turn out a single cruiser of any kind, we can not be truthfully accused of having, at least for a great many years, been engaged in any competition with Great Britain or any other country in the building of this type of warships.

In 1915, when the famous triangular controversy with Great Britain and Germany over the rights of neutrals on the high seas was approaching a climax, President Wilson submitted to Congress a program of preparedness calling for the construction of 156 naval vessels, costing $686,000,000, and soon thereafter he departed on his tour of the country to arouse the people on the subject.

This building program was stopped when the United States entered the war in 1917 and the shipbuilding activities of the United States were turned to the construction of a different type of ships.

After the war the 1916 program was resumed, and the General Board advocated such construction as might be necessary to give the United States a "navy equal to the most powerful maintained by any nation in the world." At the same time Mr. Winston Churchill was saying to the British people: "Nothing must lead you to abandon that naval supremacy upon which the life of our country depends."

At the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armaments in 1921 the United States proposed, and Great Britain accepted, the principle of "equality" or "parity" between the sea forces of these two great naval powers. However, it was not possible to apply that principle to any except "capital" ships and aircraft carriers. It had been the original intention of the United States to apply it to all classes of naval vessels, but difficulties that could not be surmounted arose when it was sought to apply this principle to cruisers and submarines. Great Britain was ready to outlaw submarine warfare altogether, and in this had the sympathy and support of the United States. But France and Italy refused to accede to this application, and, therefore, the only limitation that was placed on cruisers was a stipulation that they should not exceed 10,000 gross tons and should be armed with guns not to exceed eight inches in caliber; but no agreement was reached as to the number of cruisers any nation should have, or the total cruiser tonnage of each nation.

In 1927 President Coolidge sought a further conference among the five nations signing the Washington treaty, upon the subject of a limitation of cruisers. To this conference France and Italy refused to be a party, and it was therefore limited to Great Britain, Japan, and the United States.

When the British and American delegates began to consider this phase of naval limitations, it was inevitable that each should look at the problem from the standpoint of their experiences in the war. Great Britain's preponderance in cruiser strength had enabled her to destroy the commerce of the enemy, control that of neutrals, and protect her own sea lanes for the transportation of food and munitions. As a result of our own cruiser inferiority, the United States was compelled to suffer interference with her trade which in all probability would not have been suffered if we had been sufficientiy equipped with cruisers to protect our legitimate interests on the high seas.

After we entered the war on the side of the Allies these controversies were merged in the common interest, and I believe the two Governments have entered into some kind of an agreement for the settlement of the claims arising out of the interruptions suffered by our people on the high seas as a result of the war.

When the 3-power conference on further naval limitations met at Geneva in 1927 it was natural for the delegates of Great Britain and the United States to arrive at a stumbling-block over the question of the uses of cruisers in the protecting of neutral trade in times of war, for neither nation seemed willing to recede from its position taken before our entry into the war. The delegates were not authorized at that conference to discuss the uses of cruisers in time of war. They were only authorized to discuss types and tonnage, and a deadlock was soon encountered which made it impossible to reach any agreement whatever.

The Kellogg-Briand multilateral treaty offers an opportunity in the future not only to bring about a further limitation of armaments but also to settle the age-old question of the rights of belligerents and neutrals upon the high seas in time of war. But until that question is settled, especially the rights of neutrals upon the high seas in time of war, it is difficult to settle the matter of relative strength which any maritime nation should possess in the protection of its legitimate commerce among the nations and among belligerents while war is in progress.

I am very greatly interested in the position taken by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on the subject of the rights of belligerents and neutrals. I think it would be a happy occasion if we might look forward to the solution of that problem by some sort of peaceful arrangement and understanding that might be arrived at between the maritime nations of the world. But in these days when war comes, in view of the fact that armies alone do not make war against opposing armies but the population of a nation likewise makes war against the population of the opposing nation, industry, labor, transportation, finance, all of the accumulated forces of the people of the respective nations being mobilized as instruments of warfare against their antagonists, it is not entirely easy to see how the nations can even arrive at an understanding or an agreement as to what is the freedom of the seas or what is contraband of war any more than it was possible to arrive at a definition of self-defense in the consideration of the treaty which was recently ratified by the Senate of the United States and entered into by nearly all of the nations of the earth.

In that connection, Mr. President, I desire to insert in the RECORD at the end of my remarks a very able and intelligent article which appeared in the New York Times of last Sunday, January 27, by Prof. James T. Shotwell, discussing the question of the Kellogg-Briand treaty and its relationship to the settlement of the question of freedom of the seas and contraband of war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in discussing the relative strength of the nations in vessels capable of protecting legitimate commerce we must also keep in mind that Great Britain has some 40 or more merchant vessels which are capable of being converted into cruisers when needed for naval purposes in time of war. So when we add these 40 vessels which are capable of conversion into war-time cruisers to the 56 now already in the British Navy Great Britain has 96 potential cruisers against our 10 at present and our 18 when we shall have finished the 8 now under construction.

As already stated, when the Washington conference met in November, 1921, it was the purpose of the United States to insist upon naval equality with Great Britain. Great Britain agreed to that principle, and it was applied to capital ships but was not applied to cruisers. Why, may I ask, should cruisers have been eliminated from the agreement? If the interests of the United States and Great Britain are so nearly equal in extent and importance as to justify equality in naval strength, why should this equality be limited to the type of ships which many intelligent observers believe has lost a large part of its value and effectiveness in naval warfare? Why should there be a limitation as to battleships but no limitation as to cruisers? It is difficult for any fair-minded man to understand the reason for limitation in one type and unlimited right and power in the other type.

In the discussion of this question it is fortunate that we may view it in the calmest and most friendly spirit. There is no asperity or ill feeling injected into this matter because of the necessity of mentioning the name of Great Britain. We admire the people of Great Britain. Many of us have descended from them. The ties of kinship, of common language, and common ideals all militate against military conflict between these two great English-speaking nations. It would be a tragedy beyond repair if these two great nations, which have contributed so much to the welfare of the human family throughout the world, should find themselves in armed conflict. Such a conflict, Mr. President, is almost unthinkable, and I do not entertain the fear that such a conflict is either imminent or remote.

But it is entirely conceivable that conflicts to which we ourselves may not be a party may involve sacred rights and obligations upon the high seas, the transgression of which we would be compelled in honor to protest.

In recent years the United States has increased its list and quantity of manufactured products by leaps and bounds. These products find their way into all the markets of the world, and it must be so if labor in America is to be continuously and profitably employed. American imports and exports have become almost equal to those of Great Britain. American coastwise trade in 1926 amounted to more than 227,000,000 tons, valued at more than $15,000,000,000. Like Great Britain for centuries the United States has just come to realize to what extent American daily life depends upon imports from other countries.

Any interruption of our overseas trade would not only seriously affect our lives and comfort but would throw millions of men and women out of employment, depriving them of the means to live and depriving them of their power to purchase the products of other men's labor.

While the world looks to-day with hopeful eye to the day when no such danger may exist, to the day when all controversies may be settled without resort to arms, the question which confronts the people of America and confronts us here in our representative capacity, is whether it is wise to leave ourselves unprotected while we are praying for the realization of this ideal, or whether we should within reasonable limits prepare for such contingencies as may arise in the event our peaceful hopes are not realized?

If the 15 cruisers provided for in this measure were now completed and in the service of the United States Navy, we would still be far below Great Britain in cruiser strength, and but little stronger than Japan. We would have then something like 300,000 tonnage to more than 400,000 for Great Britain and over 200,000 for Japan.

That would not mean parity or equality in the sense in which I think the average man in this country and in Great Britain and in Japan looks upon that term as applied to these great countries. It would mean additional strength so definite as to serve as a check upon the ambitions of other nations to persist in the effort to maintain an overpowering supremacy on the high seas. It would constitute a strength which would compel attention and respect in any future efforts further to limit naval armaments among the maritime nations of the world.

I have faith, Mr. President, that the United States and Great Britain will yet be able to arrive at a just understanding about this delicate problem which will confront them when they shall meet again in conference.

On last Saturday night, in the city of Birmingham, England, Sir Austen Chamberlain, British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, gave expression to the conviction that the problem of naval armaments, which he described as the "only difference" between his country and the United States, could be settled amicably. "Do not be discouraged if we have not solved the problem at once," he said.

During the course of his remarks at a dinner in Birmingham, which was attended and addressed by the American ambassador, Mr. Houghton, Mr. Chamberlain said further:

As we seek to be loyal to other friends, so shall we seek to be loyal to that other nation which is nearest and most akin to us in racial and moral outlook of all the nations of the world.

The existing difference is as to how we shall apply a limitation of naval armaments fairly and justly to our different circumstances and conditions. We admit freely and willingly the parity between the United States forces and our own. It is an admission which we have never made to any other nation and which we would have made to no other nation.

That admission itself is significant, when the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs in a public address freely and openly admits the right of parity between the United States and Great Britain, and in that connection states that no such admission would be or ever has been made as to any other nation compared with Great Britain.

Such differences as have occurred have not therefore been differences of principle, but merely differences arising out of the difficulties of applying that principle to the very different circumstances and needs of the two countries.

The Foreign Secretary said he believed the "passing difficulty" loomed larger than similar differences with any other country because of the common thought and outlook of the two peoples.

I venture to say—

Said he—

that it is inconceivable that, with patience and the proper and opportune moment, friends should not be able to resolve technical difficulties which have hitherto prevented them from reaching an agreement.

The problem is to find some conclusion whereby we can measure naval strength so that the parity which both nations desire may be reached, and reached at a level which will not mean an increase in the armaments of the world, but a reduction.

Do not be discouraged if we have not solved the problem at once. Nearly 50 nations represented at Geneva have been trying to find a common measure for the limitation of armaments. I doubt if any two nations saw exactly alike on any one of the different arms which are comprised within that phrase, limitation of armaments.

Last night, in the city of London, Mr. W. C. Bridgeman, who is now the First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking on disarmament, expressed confidence in the United States as a peace-loving nation, and said that the bill for new cruisers now before the American Senate was of no concern to Great Britain. If our proposal to add 15 new cruisers to the 10 we already have and the 8 we are now building gives no concern to Great Britain, why should it give concern to anybody in the United States who may fear that the interests of Great Britain are to suffer because we undertake to approach that parity which was in the minds of all the statesmen who assembled in 1921 and 1922 in an effort to bring about actual parity in naval strength between these two great nations?

He said, further:

I don't wish to criticize the number or size of anything America thinks necessary in the matter of cruisers, because I believe that the future peace of the world will be much safer in the hands of countries who have a generous confidence in each other than in the hands of scaremongers who try perpetually to make us believe there is grave risk of war.

I join in the belief expressed in the language I have quoted from Sir Austen Chamberlain and from Mr. Bridgeman. I earnestly believe that in the course of human events these two great nations, whose power and influence throughout the world should make for permanent peace, can arrive at a sensible and friendly solution of this great question. Until that time has arrived, no nation can complain or look upon us with fear or suspicion if we seek to approach that parity or equality to which we are admittedly entitled, and upon which not only our own security but the peace of the world may largely depend; and if the emergency is so great in order for us to begin to approach that parity which is our right, and which is admitted as our right by the foremost statesmen of Great Britain, I see no reason for delaying beginning that program until some other conference may have met and probably failed to arrive at a conclusion for the very reason that we have not done the thing which we are seeking to do in this bill.

Therefore, Mr. President, I not only intend to support this measure but I intend to vote to retain the time limit which the measure carries in its present form.

EXHIBIT A

[From the New York Times, January 27, 1929]

(Will the Kellogg-Briand treaty serve as a stepping-stone for the development of a common policy of freedom of the seas, in accordance with the traditional American attitude toward this doctrine? This question is discussed in the following article by the professor of history at Columbia University, who points out the intricacy of a problem that has long remained unsolved.)

By James T. Shotwell

What is the effect of the pact of Paris—the Briand-Kellogg multilateral peace treaty—upon the problem of naval armament? This is the most important single question in the foreign policy of the United States at the present time. I do not refer to the discussion over the 15-cruiser bill, for that is only a relatively small and temporary part of a problem which covers the entire field of national security. Has the strategy of war been changed by the emergence of a new strategy of peace? Have the uses of army and navy been shifted in any degree from their traditional place in the realities of politics? Is there some middle ground between pacificism and militarism which will permit of an international adjustment of armaments without becoming involved in a competition which tends eternally to increase? Ten years after the close of the World War these questions which proved insoluble except in terms of conflict in the decade from 1904 to 1914 have come back upon us, not this time as a European problem, but as one in which the United States plays a major part.

PRESSING FOR A SOLUTION

If it were possible it would certainly be better to postpone the consideration of this grave question until we have caught our breath, as it were, after the ratification of Secretary Kellogg's treaty. But the pressure of events offers us no such breathing space. International questions can not be put off to suit the convenience of a nation which is not ready to consider them, if other nations insist upon their immediate consideration; and the question of armaments is a most insistent one because of the very fact which Sir Edward Grey so emphatically points out in his memoirs that failure to solve does not leave things standing as they are, but heads directly for the fatal race of nations in the implements of destruction which in turn leads toward destruction itself. Breathless or not, we must seek the solution, for the problem was already on our hands before the negotiation of the multilateral treaty was begun.

Now, the first step in the orientation of naval policy to the peace pact is to reach an understanding as to what is involved in each of them; only after we know what the one has accomplished and the other seeks to accomplish is it possible to work out an agreement between them. If the pact of Paris is only a moral gesture, and if the great sea powers are pursuing irreconcilably divergent aims, the question of disarmament is frankly insoluble. Happily, neither of these two statements is true; the pact is a real and binding obligation and the naval policies are capable of adjusting to it.

Let us see in a few words what the pact contains. It is a twofold pledge: Article 1 renounces war as an instrument of national policy and article 2 states that the solution of disputes must never be sought except by "pacific means." At first sight these commitments are vague and uncertain, but if we analyze them in terms of policy and definitely seek to apply the treaty, the vagueness disappears. For instance, insert in place of the word "national" the word "American," "British," or "Japanese"; the phrase has a very different ring. Then if we think of war not as a general concept but as definitely taking place on land, sea, or in the air, the commitment, so far as we are concerned, narrows down to this: That the United States declares that it will not wage war as an instrument of American policy wherever such a war might be waged.

Apply this to the sea and we reach the conclusion that we have renounced the belligerent use of the American Navy for the purpose of furthering our national aims and policies. This surely involves a restudying of sea strategy, although it is also part of the Navy's business to plan for those violations of the treaty which deny these very conditions. Navy policy, therefore, henceforth has a double problem, one of adjustment to the new strategy of peace and one of a safeguarding of that peace against the sort of violation which continues to present international dangers.

LEGITIMATE DEFENSE

In the discussion over the treaty it was stated that there could be no agreed definition of legitimate defense, and yet legitimate defense was excepted from the operation of the treaty. Moreover, each nation should decide for itself when it should use its belligerent forces as an instrument of national policy. If this were the full measure of the commitment and there were no indication of the way to test whether the war was defensive or not, then it would be only a gesture, and naval policy would be justified in ignoring it in the calculations of strategy and armament. But, fortunately, the treaty itself is better than its theory.

In article 2 there is a test which will establish the presumption of guilt at the outbreak of war; for the nation which proceeds to war for the settlement of its claims, instead of invoking or attempting "peaceful means" of settlement, is a violator of the pact, and according to the preamble, as interpreted by the Secretary of State, all other nations are thereupon freed from the treaty obligation to remain at peace with it.

Now the "pacific means" at hand are prescribed by other treaties to which the United States and most of the other signatories are parties. They must be kept in mind in interpreting the pact itself, for they are equally binding with it. They are treaties which prescribe the court of arbitration for issues which can be brought to trial, and conciliation and conference for those matters which lie in the heated atmosphere of political dispute. There is, therefore, a visible alternative to war, the nations must definitely choose one or the other path, and against the nation which refuses the peaceful means of settlement will stand the presumption that it has violated the pact by resort to war as the instrument of its national policy. For a treaty which covers so vast a field as the pact of Paris, the commitments are remarkably definite and clear. How do they affect the problem of armaments?

In approaching the problem of armaments from the standpoint of policy we are reversing the emphasis of all the recent discussions. Instead of basing the argument primarily upon the work of the military or naval expert whose duty it is to measure and evaluate the fighting forces of nations, we are finding it necessary to call upon the statesmen to reconsider the uses to which these forces are to be put in the future. Instead of attempting to trade cruiser for cruiser for a potential competitor, we should rather attempt to trade policy for policy and see if there is a lessening or an increasing likelihood of need for the forces themselves.

As a matter of fact, it is this political approach to the problem which has determined both success and failure in the recent history of armament negotiations, although on the surface it seemed as though the navy or military experts were determining the agreement by establishing parallel units of limitation in ships or equipment. The Washington conference, for instance, by the emphasis which it put on the ratio of 5–5–3 in capital ships seemed to be a triumph for the technical method of approach, as the Geneva conference of 1927 was an outstanding instance of failure in this line. But it was, after all, the political approach at the Washington conference which determined the acceptance of numerical categories.

The end of the Japanese-British alliance and the creation in its place of the 4-power pact in the Pacific and the 9-power agreement secured a new orientation of naval policy for Britain, the United States, and Japan, and in this new situation these powers were able to escape from the situation which had developed out of the realignment of armaments resulting from the World War. Without going back into the history of the Washington conference in detail, it is sufficiently clear that political factors dominated sea strategy; indeed, it is because the American Navy feels that the political strategy dominated to a point of disrupting its building program without due regard to the technical factors that the Washington conference is viewed so adversely by some of the Navy spokesmen. Whether the statesmanship which directed the Washington conference was wise or not is, however, a matter of history. But the Geneva conference clearly showed that the only hope of a solution of the problem as a whole lies in the field so effectively explored by Mr. Hughes in 1922—namely, that of policy as over against that of the purely technical expert.

Now, what are the major objectives of a political kind that affect American sea strategy, and what are the objectives of the British? All through American history there has been one supreme principle of naval rights which has remained an ideal unattained, and that is the freedom of the seas. On the other hand, the British have almost as consistently opposed this principle. The reason for the two national attitudes lies chiefly in the fact that the presumption of the United States has been that in most wars it would be a neutral; therefore it was but natural that it should be the champion of neutrals against belligerents throughout all its history, except in the short intervals when it itself was at war, as in the Civil War and in the World War.

On the other hand, Great Britain, involved as it is in the maintenance of a world-wide empire, has been more likely to think in belligerent terms and more likely to be drawn into wars arising almost anywhere throughout the world; but it is a strange fact that when in the nineteenth century British merchant interests were deeply engaged in neutral trade, there were intervals when Britain also gave support to ideas similar to those which are traditional in the United States.

The pact of Paris touches the very base of this controversy by its denial of the legitimacy of war as an instrument of a nation's policy, for if war is no longer the free prerogative of nations, then neutrality has also changed its character. This fact is recognized in that clause of the preamble which states that the violator of the treaty should be denied the benefits of it; for those denying the benefits are the neutrals in the war which is thus envisaged. But while no new duties are formally placed upon these neutrals, the withdrawal of their guarantee of continued peace with the treaty-breaking state is certainly out of harmony with any claim upon their part to push their trade with the power that has run amuck in the world. The situation is not the same as it was when to champion neutrality meant to lessen the sphere of belligerency and thus to further the cause of peace. In the new attitude toward war neutrality as well as belligerency can no longer be used as the free instrument of national policy; it has acquired a moral character.

This means that the doctrine of the freedom of the seas has changed its setting. It was a claim upon the part of a neutral to retain the peace-time conditions of its trade, even with belligerents, stopping only short of those measures which would make it an accomplice or an ally of a belligerent. The method of asserting this historic doctrine, therefore, was to reduce as far as possible the interference of belligerents with this trade; and the way sought to achieve this, in part at least, as at the conference of London, was to enumerate those articles and strictly limit those conditions with which the belligerent might interfere, thus leaving everything else open to the neutral.

INCREASING DIFFICULTIES

This effort to limit the interference of the belligerent was something like the parallel effort to limit the damages on land by The Hague regulations governing land warfare. Unfortunately, the experience of the World War showed that when war has become the industry which it is to-day, there are few articles of commerce which do not serve as munitions or supplies, and the difficulty of enumerating free goods has accordingly increased.

Now the way of approach to this problem lies in the application to it of the Kellogg pact; and, by a strange paradox, it is that part of the pact which is least definite that seems likely to be most useful. The one weakness in the pact is that each nation is left free to judge for itself whether its own or other future wars are defensive—and hence legitimate—or are the forbidden use of war as an instrument of national policy.

The pact itself only classifies war into these two categories. That itself is some help. Henceforth there is one kind of legitimate war; for all the reservations to the renunciation of war come under the general category of defense. There is self-defense, which is admitted as a self-evident right. There are the obligations under the covenant of the league and the treaties of Locarno and the neutrality treaties, all of which fall under the general category of "cooperative defense" against illegal attack; and the Monroe doctrine has been happily defined within the same category. But while there is a general agreement as to the character of the exceptions, there is no provision to prevent a fatal failure to agree as to which nation is really on the defensive and which the violator. It is distinctly stated that—so far as this pact is concerned—each nation must judge for itself this final question.

AN ADDITION TO THE PACT

Unless this situation is met somehow, there is real danger of the pact failing utterly to avert the division of nations in time of crisis into hostile formations, each intent on the defense of its rights or championing the defense of others. The obstacle to the application of the pact which this possibility presents may, however, be made into a stepping-stone of progress if we join to the pact of Paris, which renounces war, the pact of the Pacific, of 1922, which offers a way to secure common judgment and therefore common action with reference to disputed questions. In short, the very agreement which formed the political substructure of the Washington conference—namely, the 4-power pact for the maintenance of peace in the Pacific—may prove the means for so clarifying the working of the Kellogg pact as to connect it directly with the problem of sea strategy.

There is nothing very revolutionary in thus joining together the recent peace pact with the existing pact which erected the structure of peace in the Pacific Ocean area; yet, by bringing these two treaties into proper relations with each other, we may find not only a way for preventing disagreement in the application of the present treaty but the path, as well, toward freedom of the seas in a new sense of the term, and through it to naval disarmament.

A BRIDGE OF PEACE

The first two articles of the 4-power pact are applicable to all problems of American policy, and if applied generally, instead of in their present limited scope, would furnish the bridge between us and the organization of peace in Europe, without undue involvement on either side. All that would be called for would be that in case of a controversy between the signatory nations there should be "consultation" in which the United States would participate. Neutrals, as well as potential belligerents, would "consult together."

The European powers have already pledged themselves to enter into such consultations, in case of war or the threat of war, through the treaty of Locarno and the covenant of the league, but the United States, remaining outside the structure of these bodies, has no such obligation. As the multilateral treaty extends over too many signatories for any workable arrangement which would call for them all to consult together—except in the League of Nations—any such agreement should be formed with special regard to practical considerations. If, for example, the preparation for the renewal of the Washington conference in 1931 were to build upon this basis of an agreement to consult together as to the determination on an alleged violation of the Briand-Kellogg pact, or on alleged policies based upon this possibility, there would be a basis upon which to build other engagements as well.

These other engagements might very well take shape in a general way along the lines suggested in the resolutions of either Senator CAPPER or Senator BURTON, although the details would be modified by both the existing pact and the agreement to which reference has just been made. It might be in the shape of either a unilateral declaration upon the part of the United States or in the form of international agreement, but the substance of it would be that there would be a declaration of policy upon the part of all the signatories, including the United States, not to protect their nationals when engaged in giving aid and comfort to a signatory of the pact of Paris which has violated that pact by resorting to war without a reference of its case to the pacific means of settlement which are indicated in Article II as implemented in the parallel treaties of arbitration and conciliation.

WILSON'S POINT

If some such program as this could be carried out—and the points raised here are not more than preliminary suggestions for the solution of one of the most intricate of all problems—then we should be able to apply to naval strategy that phrasing of the demand for freedom of the seas which was set forth in the second of Mr. Wilson's 14 points:

"Absolute freedom of navigation upon the seas, outside territorial waters, alike in peace and in war, except as the seas may be closed in whole or in part by international action for the enforcement of international covenants."

As I have stated in another connection, it may yet be found that the very one of the 14 points which was surrendered in Paris—under the belief that it was no longer valid with the United States in a League of Nations—may prove to be a means for readjusting the United States to that organization of peace, and may do this by building upon American precedent and ideals. The reason why President Wilson gave up insistence upon the freedom of the seas was that he envisaged all the world within the league, and if that had happened there would have been no neutrals left. Therefore, the doctrine which is the fundamental expression of neutral rights could, in his opinion, be no longer insisted upon in the old terms.

NEW DUTIES OF MEMBERS

Now, the pact of Paris also modifies the duties of neutrals, and hence, for the United States as well as for the league, the old historic doctrine is no longer valid in its earlier form. Yet the principle remains in a new setting. By the renunciation of war the signatories are morally bound not to aid or abet a violating power. This does not mean joining in the suppression of the violator, but it does mean a complete freedom of the seas upon the part of all the law-abiding powers and a denial of it only in two cases, either by international action under the covenant or by the concurrent action of the nonleague members after agreement through consultation as to whether a nation at war has violated the pact of Paris or not.

Thus both the pact and the covenant rest upon the same fundamental principle set forth in article 11 of the covenant that "any war or threat of war whether immediately affecting any members of the league or not" is a matter of concern to all civilized nations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky in his able presentation of this matter referred to the discussion of Sir Austen Chamberlain and others upon a certain occasion. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an editorial from the Manchester Guardian that is based upon that occasion, not as a part of the Senator's speech but to follow his speech, as it refers to the same subject matter which he was discussing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Manchester Guardian]

It is a good thing the Foreign Secretary should have said Saturday night that "we have no nearer and dearer friendship than our friendship with the United States." That is certainly true, and it is a good thing the British Foreign Secretary should have said so. He could have no better guiding principle for his foreign policy.

We do not for a moment doubt that he sincerely believes this principle. But are he and those who with him are responsible for the conduct of British foreign affairs guided by it? Unfortunately not. They are more impressed by French naval armaments and the Admiralty's anxiety than by the incomparably greater power and influence of the United States. They are more moved by the superficial and superfluous Francophile sentiment than by the deep and urgent call of Anglo-American friendship. This friendship is being strained, and there is justified concern on both sides of the Atlantic.

But Sir Austen hardly admits the reality of this disquieting fact. He seems to admit nothing more than passing difficulties—not any difference of principle, but "only a difference as to how we shall apply limitation of naval armaments." This difference exists but can easily be removed if only the admirals of both countries are kept in their proper places.

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS ISSUE

It is a minor and not a fundamental difference. If it is removed, as it can be, it still leaves untouched the real problem that divides Britain and the United States. This problem, which Sir Austen Chamberlain did not even mention, is the so-called freedom of the seas. So long as it remains unsolved, "near and dear friendship" is doomed, and so is the world's peace.

Senator BORAH, speaking on the United States cruiser bill last Thursday, showed knowledge far deeper than Sir Austen Chamberlain's of the crisis in Anglo-American relations. "To my mind," he said, "this uneasiness is founded on conditions now existing on the sea in reference to maritime law." He pleaded for an Anglo-American agreement that would preserve the freedom of neutral trade on the high seas in time of war.

Freedom of the seas means a complete change in Britain's traditional conception of naval warfare. Nevertheless, despite the Admiralty, the change will have to be accomplished. In the world as it is to-day the weapon of the blockade can no longer be used effectively by Great Britain unless, as in the Great War, she has most of the world, and especially the United States, on her side.

But this same weapon, effective against her enemies in special conditions never likely to recur, will be swiftly and mortally effective against herself in conditions that are extremely probable in any future war between great powers.

Freedom of the seas means permanent friendship between the United States and immunity from blockade, and therefore from destruction for this country. Continued unfreedom of the seas means enmity with the United States and sooner or later destruction for ourselves.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 34) authorizing the reenrollment with an amendment of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7200) to amend section 321 of the Penal Code.

LEVY AND COLLECTION OF COTTON TAX (S. DOC. NO. 214)

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURTON in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to Senate Resolution 302, of January 21, 1929, regarding the levy and collection of a cotton tax during the period following the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ADMINISTRATION OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS' RETIREMENT ACT (S. DOC. NO. 215)

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a report from the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, in response to Senate Resolution 301, of January 25, 1929, requesting and directing the Director of the Veterans' Bureau to furnish the Senate at the earliest possible moment certain information in connection with the administration of the disabled emergency officers' retirement act (the Tyson-Fitzgerald Act).

Mr. McKELLAR. The report is in response to a Senate resolution. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed as a Senate document. It is a matter of very great importance to every Senator here.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF CERTAIN DISTRICT UTILITY COMPANIES

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate reports submitted, pursuant to law, of the following public-utility companies in the District of Columbia for the year ended December 31, 1928, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Washington Railway & Electric Co.;
Potomac Electric Power Co.; and
The Washington Interurban Railroad Co.

CALOOSAHATCHEE RIVER AND LAKE OKEECHOBEE DRAINAGE AREAS (S. DOC. NO. 213)

Mr. JONES presented a report from the Chief of Engineers of the Army, dated January 31, 1929, relative to a review of reports on Caloosahatchee River and Lake Okeechobee drainage areas, Florida, submitted in House Document No. 215, Seventieth Congress, first session, with a view to determining whether any modification is advisable in the report, particularly in the light of the flood of September, 1928, etc., and moved that the report, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Commerce and printed with illustrations, which was agreed to.

ROCK CREEK AND POTOMAC PARKWAY

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, last evening I asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 5339) to enable the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, established by act of March 4, 1913, to make slight changes in the boundaries of said parkway by excluding therefrom and selling certain small areas, and including other limited areas, the net cost not to exceed the total sum already authorized for the entire project.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked that it go over until they could make an examination of the bill. They have no objection whatever to the bill, and I want to have it passed and sent to the House as soon as possible, as it is almost an emergency matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a bill to enable the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission to buy certain little pieces of land in order to straighten out the parking between Rock Creek Park and Potomac Park.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the authority of the commission created by section 22 of the public buildings act, approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. 885), is extended to include the acquisition of such additional lands and premises lying adjacent to or in the immediate vicinity of the taking lines as shown on the map on file in the office of the executive and disbursing officer and known as the map of the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway (in four sheets), dated May, 1923, as may in its discretion, subject to the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts, be necessary for the best development of the connecting parkway between Rock Creek Park, the Zoological Park, and Potomac Park: Provided, That the total sum expended for lands needed for this parkway shall not exceed that authorized by section 22 of the public buildings act, approved March 4, 1913, and amended by the second deficiency act of May 5, 1926: Provided further, That the commission may exclude such lands and premises, not now owned by the United States but within the taking lines heretofore authorized for the said parkway, as may in its discretion, and upon the advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, be found not to be desirable or necessary for the connecting parkway: Provided further, That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital may dispose of the lands so excluded, either by public auction or at fair appraised value or to the owners of adjacent property at a price not less than that paid for it, as the best interest of the United States may justify: Provided further, That after payment of the necessary expenses of said sales, the net proceeds thereof shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to be credited to the appropriation disbursed by the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COAST GUARD STATION, STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. JONES. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably, with an amendment, House bill 14151, to provide for establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near the mouth of the Quillayute River in the State of Washington, and I submit a report (No. 1592) thereon.

One hundred and twenty miles of about the most dangerous coast in the country are at present without any life-saving station whatever. The department has placed this station at the head of its list. The bill has passed the House unanimously, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the amount appropriated?

Mr. JONES. Not more than $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, at the end of the bill, to insert "and the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for this purpose," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish a Coast Guard station on the Pacific coast at or in the vicinity of the mouth of the Quillayute River, in either Clallam or Jefferson County, State of Washington, in such locality as the commandant of the Coast Guard may recommend; and the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for this purpose.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if provision is not made for a station in this vicinity in one of the bills which have been passed?

Mr. JONES. This bill has passed the House, but no other bill has made provision for this station. This is at the head of the list of stations that the department has recommended.

Mr. KING. Creating new stations?

Mr. JONES. Yes. There are 120 miles of coast without any life-saving station.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

CIVIL SERVICE AND THE BOSTON POSTMASTERSHIP

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Nebraska desires to obtain the floor to speak upon the cruiser bill. I wish to express my appreciation of his courtesy in letting me have the floor for a few minutes to speak upon an entirely different matter.

Mr. President, the Senate has now before it the nomination of a postmaster at Boston. The nomination will be confirmed, for I know of no objection which is to be raised to the ample qualifications which the nominee possesses for the post. I do not intend to discuss either Colonel Gow, whom the President has named, nor Postmaster Baker, whom Colonel Gow supersedes, both of whom are highly respected citizens.

But the circumstances attendant upon this appointment afford such a glaring example of the travesty and debasement of the principle of civil service as applied to the selection of first-class postmasters that I can not let the occasion pass without directing the attention of this body and the country to a situation which, if it is to be taken as establishing a precedent, I regard as exceedingly unfortunate, in that it would seem to indicate that we are fast reverting to the old, supposedly abandoned spoils system in the matter of post-office appointments by retaining the form and discarding the substance of the civil service laws.

The postmaster now incumbent at Boston was originally appointed in the last year of the Wilson administration as a nonpartisan business-man selection, though a Republican in politics, after a competitive civil-service examination. At the expiration of his first 4-year term in 1924, after a delay of many months, with frequent newspaper comment respecting a "fight that was being waged on Baker" by elements in the Republican organization in Massachusetts, who were said to wish to award the plum to an "active Republican," the President reappointed the incumbent.

His second term expired last spring and he has been a holdover since that time. If the postmaster was rendering inefficient service, if the good of the Postal Service required that he be ousted and a better administrator named in his place, I submit that he should have then been promptly removed and his successor named. If, on the other hand, he was entitled on his record to continuance in office, his reappointment should have been equally promptly forthcoming. The logic of that statement seems to me to defy contradiction.

The President, however, did nothing. He said nothing. Postmaster Baker, meantime, was a storm center between those who desired his continuance in office, which included practically 100 per cent of the postal employees of Boston and Greater Boston, and those few but powerful politicians who desired to oust him. The morale of the Boston post office was impaired. Months passed; but as soon as the election was over, indications appeared that the Post Office Department and the White House finally desired to "settle the question" of the Boston postmastership.

The newspapers in Boston contained frequent allusions to the "efforts of the Republican organization" to agree upon a man for the place. Subsequently Washington dispatches pictured the President as waiting for a unanimous recommendation and impatient at the further delay; and several Boston papers, as early as Saturday, December 8, on their first page, under headlines Gow to be New Post Office Chief Here, recounted that the Republican national committeeman of Massachusetts was on his way to Washington to "take up with the President" the Boston postmastership and would ask that Colonel Gow receive the place.

Three days later, following this conference, the President directed the Civil Service Commission to hold a postmastership examination at Boston. In commenting on this the Boston newspapers reported that Gow had been selected, and that he would receive the appointment "as soon as the Civil Service Commission has a chance to certify his name."

Subsequent events, unhappily, confirmed this prophecy, and clearly demonstrated what a farce the civil-service routine amounted to in this instance.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean to say that the appointment was made before the Civil Service Commission was asked to certify any names?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No. If the Senator will refrain until I complete the statement, I think he will understand that, while the appointment was alleged to have been agreed upon, the examination was actually held later to which I am about to refer.

Let me quote at this point a paragraph from a Washington dispatch published in Boston on December 28:

> The Civil Service Commission is making something of a mystery of the names and the number of applicants for examination for the Boston postmastership vacancy. The fact seems to be that to date the applications have been so few as to make the whole examination procedure seem slightly ridiculous. Time for filing applications expires next Monday. In theory the commission is to select and qualify three applicants out of the entire field, and the President may then appoint any one of the three so qualified. This presupposes that at least three persons within the city of Boston will make application for this important and lucrative post. But the fact has been pretty well advertised that the appointee has already been selected in advance, namely, Charles R. Gow.

The examination proceeded. As most of my colleagues know but as most persons in the country do not know, the civil-service examination in the case of a first-class post office consists almost entirely of a personal interview with the various candidates by an inspector of the Civil Service Commission and an inspector of the Post Office Department acting jointly and a check-up on the various indorsements and recommendations that may be submitted to them.

The civil-service ratings reached the White House last Monday morning, and the appointment of Colonel Gow was before the Senate within a few hours. The President acted with celerity.

On the eligible list of three submitted by the commission Colonel Gow stood first with a rating of 89.20 per cent; Postmaster Baker second with 82.20 per cent. The third candidate was rated 72 per cent. Colonel Gow's rating reflected a 5 per cent war veteran's preference. The commission explained that in the "actual examination" Colonel Gow was rated 84.20 per cent, 2 points ahead of Baker, who was postmaster for eight years.

So by all this hocus-pocus—and I submit that in this instance "hocus-pocus" fittingly describes the chain of events—the President was permitted at one and the same time to name the candidate whom the Republican organization had selected for the place and the candidate who stood at the head of the civil-service list, which the President had asked for as a preliminary to the appointment.

I ask to have annexed to my remarks and printed in the RECORD—because, after all, this statement is more for the RECORD—a statement issued by the Civil Service Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT GIVEN OUT BY CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION DECEMBER 31, 1928

(Preceded by information that nine applications had been filed up to noon December 31 and that one or two more might come in before end of day.)

There should have been 25 or 30 applicants for this important position. Why this apparent lack of interest? It is the old story. The news was broadcast that some one had been selected in advance, therefore due competition was lacking.

The situation is not unusual; indeed, it is usual. The Civil Service Commission announces postmaster examinations and all other examinations in good faith and conducts them impartially. But its certification of eligibles for a postmastership is referred by the Post Office Department to some local dispenser of patronage for the selection of the one who is to be nominated by the President. It is known in advance that this will be done; the information is given wide publicity in the community. The natural result is a very small number of applicants. This increases the chance of the "favorite" to land among the high three in the rating. He can not be nominated unless he is among the high three.

There are a number of unfortunate results of this practice. Competition is discouraged at the start, and often the highest eligible, believing that an injustice has been done if he does not receive the appointment, condemns the Civil Service Commission and all its works. Under the present regulations any one of the high three eligibles may be nominated for appointment. The full possibilities of open competition in postmaster examinations can not be realized until the 4-year tenure law is repealed and appointments are made strictly on a merit basis. Such a change would establish public confidence and encourage much wider competition. Under the present anomalous conditions the Civil Service Commission suffers unjust criticism and the prestige of the merit system is lowered.

Notwithstanding all this, the commission's postmaster examinations are serving a good purpose. The unworthy and the unqualified are weeded out. The standards of postmasterships have been raised. If some one is named in advance for the appointment, he can not receive it unless he is qualified, both as to business experience and character. If he is not, the commission will not certify him as eligible.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I submit that this represents an intolerable condition. Let us have done with pretense. If postmasters are to be named for political consideration, or for any other reason, but named none the less by the Executive on his own sole decision, let the appointments be made by Executive order. If they are to be made under civil-service procedure, let us have the reality and not merely the form. To use the civil service as a mask to conceal the true considerations which dictate the ousting of one man and the selection of another is political hypocrisy with which I have no sympathy.

The Boston case is typical of innumerable other instances throughout the country. The appointment of postmasters is largely partisan under the appearance of civil-service procedure. That in this instance the appointee, Mr. Gow, is a man of ability and integrity does not remove the objection that I register to the pretense of civil service in postmastership appointments and the consequent disrepute of the civil-service system among the people.

This case illustrates also how misleading was the civil-service plank in the national Republican Party platform in 1924. I quote from that platform:

> By Executive order the appointment of presidential postmasters has been placed on merit similar to that applying to the classified service.

That was the boast of the Republican Party in its platform of 1924. Let us see how far they strayed from the merit system as applied to the classified service.

Appointments in the classified service are by law removed from all political consideration, and an appointee under the classified service can not be removed except for specified causes and an opportunity for a hearing given. It is unlawful for an official making an appointment from the civil service classified service to consider the political affiliations of the three names certified. Under the method now in vogue, political considerations can be and are taken into consideration by the Post Office Department—there being no Executive order or law forbidding it, as in the case of the classified service. Further, in the case of first-class postmasters there is no examination held, merely an investigation made by representatives of the Post Office Department and the civil service.

Mr. President, I have tried to express my views as moderately as possible. I want to be correct in my statement of the facts and refrain from coloring or exaggeration. I have no objection to the confirmation of Mr. Gow, who, in my opinion, possesses excellent qualifications; I do object and protest vigorously against the sham and mockery of claiming and pretending to make these appointments upon a real civil-service status.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much interested in the disclosures the Senator has made. I think it is the duty of the Senator, however, to follow the matter up, and I would like to see it followed up. I would like to see what the defense in this case is. As a believer in civil service, one who has always tried to befriend the civil service law and the Civil Service Commission in what they do, I realize that very serious charges are made against them, and I would like to have the Senator introduce a resolution directing the Committee on Civil Service of the Senate to investigate the facts in this case and make an official report to the Senate.

I agree with the Senator entirely in this respect—that we either ought to have this civil service law in regard to postmasters observed in good faith, or we ought to throw away the pretense and go back to the pie-counter system and admit what we are doing.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is exactly my position. But I want to say, in answer to the Senator from Nebraska, that an investigation would serve no good purpose. The facts are, I think, substantially as set forth by me. We would finally come back to this fact, that a civil-service examination was held, Mr. Gow was reported at the head of the civil-service list as first, and what Senator could challenge, without some evidence, which is not obtainable, the fact that that examination was made in good faith?

I have set forth the story of this appointment in order that the public could draw their own inferences with respect to the extensive degree that politics and the slight degree that civil service prevails in postmastership appointments.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. I must have misapprehended the statement of the Senator, because I do not see that there was any irregularity at all. As I understand the statement of the Senator, three names were handed to the President; that is to say, an eligible list with three names on it from which he could select a postmaster. In point of fact, he selected the postmaster who got the highest rating.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true, but the Senator must consider the earlier facts as well as the final act of appointment.

Mr. BRUCE. That rating, mind you, was given to him, as I understand it, by a representative of the Civil Service Commission along with the postal inspectors. For the life of me, I do not see where any wrong was done. It may have been my own stupidity that kept me from seeing it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Four years ago, when the first term of Mr. Baker expired, no examination was held, and the incumbent was reappointed. This year political opposition was raised, a man was selected for the office, an examination was held, and as a result of the examination, as the Senator has stated, Mr. Gow stood first on the list and was thus appointed. The Senator must take into consideration not the final step but all the preliminary activities.

Mr. BRUCE. Examinations are constantly held under those circumstances in connection with the selection of postmasters. The wrong comes where an eligible list is handed up, and the President, instead of taking the first man on the eligible list, chooses, for political reasons, to take somebody lower down in the scale of merit. That happened in the city of Baltimore some years ago. We have a very good postmaster there; I am not saying anything against him. Our present Republican postmaster is a very fine man in every respect, and I think he has made an excellent official. But there was an examination some years ago, and a Democrat, that is to say, the former postmaster, one of the most capable men we have ever had in Federal office in the city of Baltimore, had the highest rating. Yet he was not appointed.

The gentleman who is now postmaster at Baltimore—and, as I say, a very admirable official in every regard—was selected, although his rating was lower than that of the incumbent. I can see that a case like that might well justify such feelings as those which the Senator has expressed. But here, as I understand, there was an examination, in which the prior incumbent participated with two other contestants. However, his rating, as the result of the examination, was not so high, and one of his competitors obtained the highest rating, a gentleman by the name of Gow, I believe. The Senator did not give us a very clear idea as to how searching that examination was, but the examination as to the qualifications of these applicants, as I understand it, was one that was conducted by a representative of the Post Office Department of the Government and by the United States Civil Service Commission. Anyhow, the two postal inspectors rated the applicants for the position, and they rated the applicant to whom the Senator is objecting as having obtained the highest mark in the competition. The three names were handed up to the President, and I think the President would have done a wrong thing if he had not appointed the highest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am not objecting to the appointment of Mr. Gow. I am objecting to the fact that a postmaster held this office for eight years, a man appointed under civil service originally, reappointed by a Republican President, and has been ousted after an examination which was brought about through political influence, for the purpose of giving somebody else a job. The postmaster, if appointed under real civil service, should have had the right to have charges brought against him before he was dismissed, a right to have a hearing, a right to have his qualifications determined. If he was only a political appointee, the President had the right to put him out. But under the pretense of civil service to-day no appointee has a civil-service status that is respected when politicians want another man named to supplant the incumbent.

Mr. BRUCE. I say, if the former postmaster under that examination was not able to obtain the highest gradation of merit and one of his competitors did attain it, his competitor should have been appointed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator, as well as I, has a perfect right to draw his own inferences. Then the Senator thinks there ought to be a competitive examination?

Mr. BRUCE. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Every four years?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Whether the man is retained under civil service or not, and the highest man is named? That is not the practice, except where the incumbent is to be ousted.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; because the nature of these examinations is such that if there is a fair examination—and I think in most cases, though perhaps not in all, the examinations are fair—the chances most decidedly are that the prior incumbent of the office will obtain the highest mark.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator know there is no real examination at all, but all they do is to go out there and submit questions and call on some people in the community to see which is the best man? That is the only examination that is held.

Mr. BRUCE. This examination was conducted by one of the representatives of the Government. He was a subordinate of the United States Civil Service Commission and I know enough about that commission to know that it does not lend itself readily to any "hocus-pocus," to use the expression of the Senator from Massachusetts. I believe that, whatever the examination was, and until I know the contrary, it was fairly conducted. It may not have been such an examination as it should have been, but I am taking the examination as it was.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator does not suggest that it is the practice or that it has been the practice heretofore to hold civil-service examinations for postmasters who have been appointed within the service? The object of making the appointments under the civil service, as I understand it, is to take the positions out of political influence and secure persons well qualified, and that once one is admitted into the service through the civil-service examination he remains there until he becomes incapacitated. Examinations are not usually held, where there is no charge against the postmaster, after he has once been admitted through the civil service.

Mr. BRUCE. I was about to relate a case which came to my notice in the State of Maryland. There was quite a ludicrous incident brought to my attention several years ago. An examination was held. The incumbent was a Democrat. It was during the Coolidge administration. He made the highest mark and then there was a tremendous effort made——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? As I understand it, the actual practice is to establish a list of three eligibles, and from that list any one may be chosen. In certain southern cities I know of the actual choice is made from the list through what is called the patronage referee. He is a Republican of influence in the State and in the organization. He takes the list of three and selects any Republican on the list, even though he may be lower in grade than two Democrats—I mean lower in his civil-service grading.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not speaking of the South, because everybody knows post offices in the South are mere merchantable commodities.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think that is altogether true. I think the plan applies throughout the Union. The object is evidently to give deserving but somewhat qualified Republicans preference over unworthy Democrats who are highly qualified.

Mr. BRUCE. I am not speaking from a partisan point of view, because I do not believe that partisanship has anything whatsoever to do with the administration of the Federal merit system of appointment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does not the Senator understand that a list of three eligibles or more is established for the purpose of giving the department the opportunity of recommending, not necessarily the one standing highest on the eligible list, but some one who is generally acceptable from a political standpoint?

Mr. BRUCE. I think the object of creating the appointment list in the way in which it is done is to give the appointing power a little discretion. The point in this case was that the President did not go down to the man who got the second rating. He took the man who got the highest rating.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There was a case of a postmaster already qualified and in the service, having passed previous examinations and supposed to remain in the service until he became either incompetent or charges were preferred and sustained against him. One of the objects of the civil service is to give the incumbent the benefit of security in his position.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator may think that is the best system. I am not stopping to ask whether that is the best system or not, but it is not the system, so far as my observation goes, now in vogue. The term of a postmaster ends. He undergoes a competitive examination then with other applicants for the postmastership. My observation is that the incumbent is very apt to be reappointed because, by virtue of the special experience he has had as postmaster and the practical nature of the tests applied, he is more likely to come out from the examination with a higher rating than his rivals.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator know as a matter of fact that where the postmaster is satisfactory to the politicians in his State they do not give him any examination, but reappoint him without examination; and where he is not entirely satisfactory they do give him an examination for the purpose of getting rid of him?

Mr. BRUCE. Undoubtedly. There is no doubt that the appointment of postmasters under such conditions as those obtaining in Boston tend to create great political abuses. In Maryland a man who happened to be postmaster, the existing incumbent in the office, got the highest mark on the examination. There was a Republican woman who was also an applicant for the appointment, and a tremendous amount of influence was brought to bear to have her made postmistress instead of the existing incumbent being made postmaster. The existing incumbent, seeing what was about to happen to him, made an appeal to me and I was about to present the matter to the Senate, and present it in the most indignant terms I could command, when the Republican politicians of the State, interested in this lady securing the position, found another job for the existing incumbent. They bought him off with another job, so I never had any opportunity to present the matter to the Senate. I do not say that is the usual case. At times postmasters are undoubtedly appointed through political influence and as the result of political abuses, but not always by any means.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to say for the Senator's benefit that I can tell of a similar case to that in the city of Boston which is taking place right in my own home city of Butte, Mont.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They are taking the office away from the incumbent, despite the protests of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not see why the existing incumbents of the postmasterships should not be reappointed. I can see that there is room for difference of opinion there, but I do not see anything bad in a system that enables the existing incumbent of a post office to become the subject of a competitive examination.

Mr. WHEELER. But they do not give him any competitive examination at all. A representative of the commission simply goes out there and inquires of a few people as to who they think would be the best man, and then they have him appointed on that basis.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator means the examination is not searching enough?

Mr. WHEELER. I mean it is not an examination at all.

Mr. BRUCE. Then the subordinate of the Civil Service Commission lent himself to a fraud in the administration of the postal laws or the civil service laws. I do not believe it. I am not saying that a perfectly reasonable and just man like the Senator from Massachusetts might not draw an entirely different inference from mine under the circumstances. It is hard for me to believe until most convincing testimony be laid before me that the United States Civil Service Commission would send to Boston a member of its staff and that that man would deliberately pervert the purposes of the Federal merit system of appointment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, are we going to postpone our declaration of war against Great Britain until this post-office matter is settled? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. I know the Senator always favors war in any form, especially when I am the other belligerent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland seems to fail to recognize the point I have been trying to make. I am not criticizing the Civil Service Commission. I am objecting to the absence of real civil-service methods. We now have only the name, without the substance of civil service.

Mr. BRUCE. Perhaps I did.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In repeated instances, where examinations have been held and the incumbent has been first on the list, the second or third eligible has been chosen. My objection is not to whether the first person or second person or third person was chosen, but my objection is to giving the impression that these appointments are under civil service when they are not. It is a very unusual coincidence that the Republican national committeeman of Massachusetts was able to put his hand upon the man whom he wanted to name and whom he sought to have the President name by an Executive order without even an examination, and was finally able to have an examination held and have him selected for the post.

The thing I am insisting upon is that all the civil-service rules be applied and lived up to in the matter of the appointment of postmasters as well as other appointments on the classified list, or else done away with entirely. The appointments of postmasters to-day are largely partisan. The choice of the three names certified comes down to a political test.

I have not any objection, I repeat, to Mr. Gow. I am not opposing his nomination. It so happens that Mr. Gow is an exceptionally well-qualified man for the office. I am not challenging the examination. But I am challenging the claim that a man can be appointed under civil service, be reappointed under civil service, and finally be ousted by a group of politicians using influence at the expiration of the man's term of office, having another examination held, and a political selection made, with the incumbent's apparent civil-service rights, regardless of his efficient service, being entirely disregarded.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, I was not here when my colleague began his remarks, but I understand he has used the Boston postmastership appointment as an illustration of the violation of civil-service principles. I think he has taken a very unfortunate illustration. I do not blame my colleague at all for being peeved that Mr. Baker is not reappointed. He was appointed as a Democrat and although I believe about two years ago he changed and registered himself as a Republican, still I understand he has always, very naturally and very properly, been a supporter of my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Massachusetts yield to his colleague?

Mr. GILLETT. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I must state to the Senator that Mr. Baker has been a Republican, so far as representations to me have been made, and that not later than the recent campaign he wrote me a letter in which he said:

> I am a Republican and I am not supporting you, and I want you to know it.

Mr. Baker has repeatedly asserted to me that he has never supported me or any other Democrat, but is a Republican and was voting for the Republican candidate. The trouble that has come to Mr. Baker is not due, in my opinion, to his republicanism, but is due to his unwillingness to use his office for partisan political ends.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. President, I am very glad to have that information, though it is quite contrary to what I had understood, but I think the statement is correct that it is only within a couple of years that Mr. Baker has become a Republican. He was appointed by President Wilson; but I admit that that is irrelevant. I have always been a hearty supporter of the civil service; I wish we could take the post offices entirely out of politics; but in this instance it seems to me the facts prove this is not a political appointment.

In the first place, Mr. Gow stood higher on the list than did Mr. Baker, who also competed, and the man who stood highest on the list was selected.

I do not come from that section of Massachusetts; I come from the western part of the State, and I do not know much about Boston or the administration of the post office there. I only know what has been told me, and I have been told that two complaints have been made against Mr. Baker; first, that he was not efficient; and, second, that he allowed the post office organization to be used to assist the Democratic Party. That, I think, was the chief complaint against him. It may be true or it may not be true, but I have been so told by a great many prominent Republicans in Boston whom I know. That is the general impression, and I know that for that reason they would like to be rid of Mr. Baker.

However, Mr. President, after the examination was held, the man who stood third on the list was one of the most influential, expert, and experienced politicians in the city of Boston as well as an experienced and efficient administrator. If the President had desired to make a political appointment, the third man would have been selected because, beyond all question—and I have known him for years—while he is an admirable, high-class man he is also one of the most experienced men in the political world in Boston.

As for Mr. Gow, I have known most of the politicians in Massachusetts for many years, but I never knew Mr. Gow, and never heard of him, to my knowledge, until he was recommended for this position. So it seems to me it is rather an exaggeration to charge that this is a political appointment, when the man who stood highest on the list was selected, and a man who has never, so far as I know, been active in political life. I admit with regret that the merit principle does not always control, but, in this instance, it seems to me clear that the best man was chosen.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, along the line of the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] with reference to postmasters, let me state what took place in my home city of Butte, Mont. Four years ago a Republican was selected for the postmastership there after having passed the civil-service examination. In December of last year his term expired. He has made probably one of the most efficient postmasters we have ever had in the city of Butte; he has the commendation of the president of the chamber of commerce, the leading merchants of the community, and of many of the leading Republicans, but notwithstanding that fact I learned that some one else was to be appointed in his place. I called up the Post Office Department to ascertain whether or not the department was contemplating any change and to ascertain whether or not there was anything against the present postmaster. I was informed that, so far as the department knew, there was nothing against him, but that the Republican national committeeman of Montana, Mr. Schurtzler, is insisting that the department appoint another Republican to take the place of the present Republican postmaster. So the department has ordered, if you please, another civil-service examination to be held in the city of Butte for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of ousting this Republican, who has given entire satisfaction to the community there, in order that it may appoint some one else whom the Republican national committeeman for that State would rather have in that place.

It can not be claimed that the present postmaster of the city of Butte is a Democrat, because he has been affiliated with the Republican Party and its organization ever since he has lived in that city. It can not be contended in any way, shape, or form that he has been a supporter of mine, because he has always supported the Republican ticket, so far as I know. I submit that if that sort of thing is going to continue, we should not contend that the postmasters are under the civil service, but should realize that the administration is merely using the civil service as a cloak for the purpose of appointing whomsoever the local State politicians may choose for these positions. In this particular instance, I think, the reason why the department wishes to punish the postmaster is because of the fact that while he was postmaster he would not turn over the post office and permit it to be used for political purposes.

As a Democrat I do not like to interfere in a Republican fight, but why claim that the civil service applies to postmasters? Why not be frank and say the politicians can and do dictate the appointments and can and do oust men who are in the service, providing that the postmaster does not donate to the Republican campaign fund or bend the knee to the politicians?

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in taking the floor in opposition to the pending cruiser bill I do so with the utmost respect for the views of those who favor it. To begin with I concede that all the Members of the Senate whether they favor the bill or whether they are opposed to it, as well as a vast majority of the people of the United States regardless of which side of the question they may be on, as, indeed, all persons in the civilized world, divided as they are on the question, alike are moved by perfectly honest and honorable intentions and are trying to do what in their respective judgments they believe to be best in order to obtain and to secure international peace. To my mind this discussion, however, has disclosed that so far as this bill or the necessity for it is concerned, it must be considered with relation to only one other nation besides our own.

There is no other nation comparable to the United States in naval armament except Great Britain. It seems to me that the debate both here and elsewhere has demonstrated the fact that if it is necessary or advisable to build the cruisers proposed to be constructed by this measure it is because there is danger of war with Great Britain. Without the proposed cruisers we are, with the exception of Great Britain, in a class by ourselves so far as naval armament is concerned. No other nation is sufficiently near to us in naval armament to cause any uneasiness so far as naval armament is concerned in case of war with any other nation. Therefore it seems to me to follow logically that we are building this addition to the Navy for fear there might be war with Great Britain; yet no one is willing to admit such a fear; no one is willing to admit that he even believes that there is at present anything upon the political horizon that can possibly bring on war with Great Britain; indeed, the very able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who has spoken this afternoon upon the question, has frankly stated in effect that he saw no danger now and did not believe there ever would be any danger of war with Great Britain.

I believe when he made that statement he expressed the judgment of most of the experts of the civilized world on the subject as well as the judgment of most of the leaders both in our country and elsewhere. It is hardly conceivable that Great Britain and the United States should ever engage in war.

The naval armament of the two nations, it is conceded, I think, in some respects gives an advantage to Great Britain, while in some other respects it gives an advantage to the United States, and in still other respects the two nations are tied. To my mind—and this argument is not original with me; I have heard it and read it ever since there has been any controversy over the size of our Navy—we under no circumstances need as large a navy as does Great Britain. Even if we admit we are going to war with Great Britain, we would have a great advantage, because Great Britain must have a sufficient navy to protect the island mother country from any possible interference with her trade, and particularly trade in the necessaries of life, for within 30 days, if that trade were interrupted, the British people would be starving.

She has possessions over the world which she must protect, and that requires a much larger navy than is required to protect any possessions that we may have. While in case of war there would be great distress, perhaps, if it were carried on for any great length of time and our country was completely cut off from all the other countries of the world, yet we know that if the worst should come to the worst we could practically live within ourselves, within our borders, for an unlimited length of time. Therefore, even if we should go so far as to say that we may have war with Great Britain, we would have such an advantage on account of the physical condition of our country and the possibility of supplying all our needs within our own country that we would not need half as large a navy as Great Britain would be required to have in order to protect her people for any length of time, even though it be a short time.

Mr. President, it may be that those are right who contend that the way to get an agreement with Great Britain is to build a navy as big as hers, or bigger, and then we will be in position to bring her to consent to a further limitation of armaments. I do not believe that argument is logical, although, as I said at the beginning, I am not criticizing the man who believes that that is the way to bring about this kind of an agreement. The truth is that the entire world is watching the two leading nations, Great Britain and the United States, in the race for naval supremacy, and the other nations are patterning after these two.

I read just the other day of the action of Italy, which had decided to lay down some new cruisers. The article referred to the fact that both Great Britain and the United States were increasing their navies; why should not Italy be allowed to do the same thing without any criticism being made against her for so doing?

As I say, the nations of the entire world are watching these two Governments in this race; and they are basing their action in the way of increase of armaments and increase of expenditures for additional warships upon the pace that is set by Great Britain and the United States.

I think Great Britain, since the disarmament conference, although she had a perfect right to do it, was very unwise in the steps she took to build additional cruisers. Although I do not agree with anyone who says that in any way, directly or indirectly, she was bound by the disarmament conference not to do it, I think she made a mistake in doing it. I think she is to blame in the action she has taken for at least one-half of the sentiment that has grown up in this country behind this bill, and that her action has caused in every other nation of the world a feeling that it was its duty likewise to increase its naval armament, since Great Britain had taken the lead; and I concede that if we follow along that argument it would be logical for us to say, "Great Britain has increased her navy and we ought to increase ours, because, as far as battleships are concerned, she has more of them than we have now, and she is building still more."

Mr. President, if there were either danger of war with Great Britain or a certainty of war with Great Britain, if I did not believe that we could engage in that war with a smaller navy than she had with an equal chance of success, I should feel that we were justified in following her lead, because, after all, a national armament is something that depends upon what the other governments do. I concede that. But if we admit, which I think is fair, that there is not any danger of war with Great Britain, and if we admit, which I believe a fair consideration of the subject will compel us to do, that even in a war with Great Britain we do not need a navy of the same size that she has to have, then, as I look at the matter, the reason for building these cruisers disappears.

Who has a duty before the world to perform when other nations are looking to Great Britain and the United States, the two most powerful nations in the world, and are following in their footsteps? Can either one of those nations say, "We owe no obligation to humanity"? Can either one of those governments, in the face of the present civilization of the world, fail to say, "We ought to pay some respect in this armament race to the opinions of others who are following us and trying to pattern after us"? Those two nations can, without any loss of prestige, without any possible fear of injury, even in case of war, pay some attention to that sentiment of the civilized world.

While Great Britain has not done that, as it seems to me, she ought to have done, the question comes up to us now, "Can we do it without any danger?" If we can, we owe it not only to the civilized world but to our own people—especially to our own taxpayers, who must bear the burden—to do that thing.

I see no reason why we can not do it. I do not believe there is any danger of war with Great Britain; and even if I did believe there was danger of war to-morrow, while I should vote then for additional cruisers, because I should want to surpass Great Britain if possible, yet, for the reasons I have stated before, I should not feel handicapped because Great Britain had more cruisers than we had.

Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to set before the world an example of our consideration, an example of our desire for world peace. Somebody must do it. Somebody must stop this interminable race, which, if not stopped, will, from taxation alone, ruin the civilized world. It is handicapping it now; and this race is one in which every nation can engage, in which every nation will engage, in which every nation will be more or less driven to engage unless somebody stops it.

We are better equipped than any other nation in the world to stop it. As far as a war is concerned, it seems to me that at the present time we stand without a peer in the civilized world. It has been truly said that under the conditions of modern warfare navies and armies do not fight the battles. The resources of the country, the private citizens, the manufacturers, agriculture, all the different classes of citizenship, must be, and in a modern war are, mobilized behind the men at the front. The scientific men, the chemists, the men in the flying machines, the men in all walks of life, between the plowhandles and behind the counter, and the women in the kitchens and in the homes all over the land, are part of the fighting forces in every modern war.

The debt that a government owes when it begins a war is a great handicap, depending upon its size. We are better equipped in that respect than any other nation in the world. Our resources are more unlimited than those of any other nation. We are now the creditor nation of the entire world. Our credit is better than that of any other nation. We have as intelligent and as patriotic a citizenship as any nation in the world. We can put behind our Navy and our Army a force in the industrial field and in all the activities of life that can not be put behind any other navy or army in the civilized world. Therefore it seems to me, without any possible danger of war with any nation in sight, with a horizon perfectly clear, that we can afford to take the step that somebody must take if we are going to stop this unreasonable, this uncivilized, this inhuman race for naval supremacy.

We run no risk in doing this; and it seems, therefore, that we can well give an example to the world that even if Great Britain has not done what we feel she ought to have done, we are ready to take the step and to say to the world and to say to Great Britain, "We are going to wait, now; we are going to pause, and we ask you to pause with us. We call your attention to the fact that unless you do we will ultimately have to get into this race, and in that event we will do the best we can to outstrip you"; and she knows we can do it. The world knows we can do it. It is in no sense in a bragging or boastful way that I say it. It is common knowledge that we can go into this race for military supremacy, because of our resources and our financial position in the world, and outstrip any other nation. Therefore, in that respect, being the leader in the entire civilized world, it seems to me it is up to us to say, "We are willing to stop. We can go further than anybody else, but we are willing now to quit. We are going to pause, and say to you now, 'Great Britain, you pause with us. You agree with us on a limitation of armaments, and particularly as to cruisers. If you do not, of course, we can not prevent the demand that will come ultimately from our people that we enter the race and that we compete with you in this naval race.'"

Mr. President, one of the greatest advocates of a big navy in modern times was Theodore Roosevelt, a man whom I always admired, and whom I usually followed. He advocated the building of a big navy. He advocated all the time, without interruption, that the United States should increase its Navy. At that time we were away below Great Britain. We were not even second in a military sense; and in his argument, as far as I know, he never argued that we should try even to equal Great Britain with our Navy.

I want to read an extract from a book by Theodore Roosevelt entitled "Fear God and Take Your Own Part." On page 87 of that book Mr. Roosevelt said:

> There are two immediately vital needs to be met, that our Navy shall at the earliest possible moment be made the second navy in point of size and efficiency. We do not need to make it the first. Great Britain is not a military power, and our relations with Canada are on a basis of such permanent friendliness that hostile relations need not be considered. But the British Empire would quite properly be neutral if we were engaged in war with some great European or Asiatic power.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. NORRIS. I do.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator, of course, should not forget that there has been an enormous expansion in our foreign commerce since Roosevelt's time.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I know there has been. I admit that.

Mr. BRUCE. For instance, our commerce with South America has gone up from about $260,000,000, as I recollect, to a billion dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. But the reasons given by Mr. Roosevelt, then, are true now. One of the main reasons is our friendliness with the great empire of Canada, a part of the British Empire, just on our north, with a boundary line extending from the Pacific to the Atlantic, much of it along the Great Lakes and navigable streams; and yet in all that stretch of thousands of miles there is not a gunboat, not a naval vessel, not an armed soldier, not a fort of any kind. Canada, lying next to us, with the possibility of becoming in the future one of the greatest empires in the world, is a demonstration of the utter lack of the necessity for trying to train armies and build forts along the boundary line, and build navies in order to keep peace.

The Senator from Maine has argued over and over again that we need this armament, not for war but to prevent war. If his argument is sound, we would have had 50 wars with Great Britain on account of the boundary line between our country and Canada, where there is no fort, and where there are no soldiers. Compare that with the boundary line between France and Germany before the World War, those countries on each side armed to the teeth, with guns and cannon and standing armies, ready at a moment's notice to grapple at each other's throats. They got into war, and where we had no soldiers and where there were no forts, there peace reigned, and still reigns, without any thought of war.

Mr. President, a race for armament will bring a combat in time. It seems to me there can be no escape from that, if we do not limit it. The World War, to a great extent, is a demonstration of that. With Great Britain armed to the teeth, with a navy the greatest in the world, and Germany at that time with the second navy, perhaps, arming every day; with every citizen in the Empire a trained soldier, with guns and ammunition and forts without comparison standing out before the whole world, they kept on arming, and they kept on and on. One would get some new guns and that would be given as a reason why the other government should do the same thing, with a result that was inevitable. They ultimately clashed. That is what we will do if we keep on in this unreasonable and illogical race.

I repeat, Mr. President, there is no danger to our country, there is no danger to our institutions, if we refuse to pass this bill. We are not going to be singled out by any country in the world and attacked; and no one believes that we will be. That will not happen. There is danger, however, if we set the example before the world which many of the nations believe we have already set. Many of the smaller nations, copying after the two models, Great Britain and the United States, are building additional warships and cruisers, training more men, building more forts. They say, "Look at Great Britain, look at the United States, towering away above us in armament. We must do something or they in time will override us." Are they afraid of us? Do they agree with Senators like the Senator from Maine that the building of this navy is no indication of war? No matter what our intentions are, by the building of these cruisers, by the expansion of our military course, we are leading on to the time when those nations may feel, to their detriment and to their injury and to their mortification, the overtowering strength brought about by our military expansion. That is what they think of us. That is why they are building ships.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. We are building these ships to a great extent because Great Britain has built cruisers since the disarmament conference.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment. We are giving that as a reason. Yet Senators say this does not mean anything except peace. A man who has a peaceful intention, who is pursuing peace, does not usually go to a hardware store and buy all the ammunition there is in town, and strap it around him, and get revolvers, and march down the street. That is not the way peace is brought about.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether that is not just what these other countries are doing. We are the only country that has not gone ahead and increased its armament appreciably since the disarmament conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that if we did not build more cruisers we would be in danger of Brazil attacking us, or Nicaragua attacking us, or Costa Rica attacking us, or Spain attacking us, or Italy attacking us, or Bulgaria attacking us? Is there any danger from any of those countries?

Mr. HALE. Probably not, and probably there is no danger of England or Japan or France or Italy attacking us. But why should we be the only ones who can not increase our naval force when all of the other great powers are increasing theirs?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is now making the same argument that is made in England, the same argument that is made in every parliament in the world. It is just as he said—if all the others are doing it, why should we not do it? That is the argument that is made.

Mr. HALE. But we have not done it.

Mr. NORRIS. But they are doing it to some extent, and every time they build a new battleship they point to the United States as an excuse for building it.

Mr. HALE. All that I want, and all those who are in favor of this bill want, is to see that we keep along on a parity with other nations and to indicate that when they are willing to cut down we are more than willing to cut down.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. I give the Senator credit for being perfectly sincere. I said that at the beginning of my remarks. I am not complaining about that. But I find fault with what I believe is the Senator's weak logic in the matter. I do not agree with his reasoning.

Mr. HALE. We have tried for six years to get them to cut down.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize what the Senator wants to do.

Mr. HALE. We have shown, in those six years, by our holding off and their going ahead, that it does not tend to get them to decrease their armament, when we have refused to go ahead and develop ours. We have shown the fallacy of the Senator's reasoning, it seems to me.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps we have, to some extent. I am not defending Great Britain. I think she is greatly to blame. Perhaps I am prejudiced because I am an American citizen; but I try to look at the matter fairly, and as I look at it I think Great Britain is subject to criticism for the course she has taken. I am not defending her. I think she is guilty of the same thing that the Senator from Maine would be guilty of if we let him have his way. It is unnecessary to do that, as I look at it. It is not only unnecessary, but it would be detrimental to world peace.

Who is going to stop this race? Who is going first to say, "Let us stop"?

Mr. HALE. We are not trying to get ahead of Great Britain. We are not even trying by this bill to catch up with Great Britain.

Mr. NORRIS. This bill is only a stepping stone. This bill is only the beginning. If this goes on the next bill will be for more cruisers, and, as the Senator himself said in the debate, the cruisers last only about 16 years and the battleships about 20.

Mr. HALE. Twenty for both.

Mr. NORRIS. Assuming that to be correct, that means that every year we must build one-twentieth of the size of our Navy in order to keep on the same level that we had to begin with.

Mr. HALE. Quite right.

Mr. NORRIS. When we do that, and then take on the expansion that is going to come when we get into this race, or, rather, if we stay in it, what will be the end? Where is the taxpayer coming in? If we have to build one-twentieth of the Navy every year and, in addition to that, provide for a lot of new vessels, where are we going to stop? It is going to bankrupt this country, as well as every other civilized country in the world. I am trying to make clear that somebody ought to stop it.

Perhaps we have gone as far as we ought to. The Senator says—and there is some reason in the remark—that we have not done as much building as Great Britain has and therefore it is up to her to stop. That may be. I will not dispute that. I am inclined to agree with the Senator. But if she does not stop it, and we are in no danger if we stop for a while, at least, let us say to Great Britain, "Now, we want you to stop or we will have to get in"; and they well know what the result will be when we go in with the intention of building a larger navy than they have. They know we can do it. The world knows we can do it. It is because we are able to do it that we, more than any other nation in the world, for the benefit of international peace and the survival of civilization, ought to be willing to keep out of the armament race as long as we run no risk in doing so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if every time we suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to have the Senator from Maine observe the rules. He starts right out without getting permission. I have the floor and I can not be interrupted without my consent. I will tell him in advance that I will always consent, but I want to do it in order. The Senator from Utah addressed the Chair first and I think I ought to yield to him first.

Mr. HALE. I think that is reasonable.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine is such an authority on the subject that I give him the preference and yield to him.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Maine, then.

Mr. HALE. I have already said to the Senator from Nebraska that I thought it was entirely reasonable for him to yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest that the Senator from Nebraska go ahead.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was about to observe that no sooner was the disarmament treaty signed after the Washington conference, than our naval authorities began agitating for bulges upon our war vessels, and for the elevation of the guns, and agitating for the construction of a large number of 10,000-ton cruisers.

In May, 1924, there was passed through the House, at the dictates of the Naval Board and Navy, a bill for the construction of eight 10,000-ton cruisers. Great Britain had not laid down a single keel for 10,000-ton cruisers. When we took that action, and they began agitating for all those modernizations upon our battleships, and forced that bill through the House for the eight 10,000-ton cruisers, Great Britain, though there was a labor government there at the time, in September, 1924, passed a bill through Parliament for the building of five cruisers of 10,000 tons each.

Our attitude has been belligerent from the beginning. It was belligerent before the Washington conference, and with the signing of the Washington conference treaty the Navy Department, or some of the board within the Navy Department, were constantly agitating for enormous increases of the Navy. Our attitude has been provocative of distrust and resentments and fear in many other parts of the world. Then a little later the navalists demanded the construction of new naval vessels, advocating 71, at a cost of more than $1,000,000,000. So all of the fault is not entirely upon one side.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. In reply to what the Senator from Utah has said, I will say that in the summer of 1923 Mr. Amery, who I believe at that time was First Lord of the Admiralty, announced the program of the Government to be to build four additional cruisers.

Nothing was said at that time about the size of the cruisers; but it was stated that Japan and other countries were building, and so it was incumbent on Great Britain to go ahead and build the new cruisers. The program of 1924 that was adopted was directly carrying this out, except that they added one cruiser to it, and in 1924 they actually laid down a certain number—five, I think it was—of new cruisers.

Mr. KING. Oh, no.

Mr. HALE. That was before we had passed the bill authorizing the cruisers. If the Senator will recall, that bill was introduced in the House in May and came over to the Senate in June and passed the Senate, and the Senator himself thereafter filed a motion to reconsider, and the whole matter was carried over until December. On December 11, I think it was, the bill authorizing eight cruisers was passed by the Senate. We did not proceed to build the cruisers until a somewhat later date.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator has not contradicted what I said, that immediately after the Washington conference we manifested our displeasure—I say we; I mean some of the officials of the Government—with the Washington conference and demanded modernization of battleships, and Great Britain contended that the program which we were outlining was in violation of the treaty. Subsequently, we were compelled to admit that the charge that Great Britain was elevating her guns in violation of the treaty was not true. Mr. Hughes was compelled to make that admission. But in addition to outlining the program for the modernization of the battleships—and I think the modernization as far as it went and was contemplated was in violation of the matter if not the spirit of the treaty—in May, 1924, pursuant to this policy of the naval board, a bill was passed through the House and came to the Senate providing for the construction of eight 10,000-ton cruisers. Great Britain had not laid down a single keel at that time and not until September, when the Ramsay MacDonald government was in control, was the bill passed for the building of any of the 10,000-ton cruisers.

Mr. HALE. I have already attempted to show the Senator that this was contemplated in 1923 as laid down in the program put forward by Mr. Amery, and that they were the ones who first started the building of the 10,000-ton cruisers.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will admit that was no official action on the part of the British Government. The facts are, as the Senator has related them, that we authorized the building of additional cruisers——

Mr. HALE. We did not authorize them until December.

Mr. NORRIS. But we did not commence to build them perhaps until after Great Britain had authorized them, and that is what we ought to expect. If we authorize the building of a lot of ships, we ought to expect every other nation in the world to immediately come in and add others to their navy, whether we commence actually building them or not.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HALE. We did not authorize it until December, 1924. They began building their ships in September, 1924.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator knows that the effort was made here to do it. We can not get away from the fact that every nation in the world having a navy is watching what we are doing here now—every one, without any exception. When we pass this bill it is going to be given as a reason for the building of cruisers all over the civilized world. They are already taking our action on the bill, which is partially completed by its passage through the House, and giving it as a reason for the ships they have already laid down. Why not? We do the same thing. We always give as an excuse when we are enlarging our Navy that some other nation is doing it. That is true in Great Britain. When they build some more ships they refer to what we have done. France will do it; Italy will do it; and Japan just did it the other day. We can not escape it. We can not escape the logic of the things that must follow our action.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I can not quite follow the Senator in his reasoning that we should not do it because the rest of the world would do it if we did.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I did not say that.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me finish?

Mr. NORRIS. Not that the rest of the world would do it. The Senator must quote me correctly.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me finish?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I only want the Senator to quote me correctly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator said other nations will build because we are building.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And that they find fault with our building. Am I right?

Mr. NORRIS. Not necessarily find fault. I said they give that as a reason for adding to their navies.

Mr. HALE. But they have already added to their navies, and there seems to be no indignation in the world at what they have done.

Mr. NORRIS. And they will continue to do it as we add to our Navy. Who is going to stop it? Who ought to stop it? Shall we say to Brazil and Italy, "In order to show good faith you must not build. You must not build any cruisers. You must not build an airplane carrier." We ought not to complain of some of those nations who are not in the same class with us so far as naval armaments are concerned.

Mr. HALE. It has nothing to do with those nations, but why should we lay back and be the only one to have an inefficient and improperly equipped navy, when the other nations of the world are going ahead and increasing their navies?

Mr. NORRIS. And at the same time we have the largest Navy in the world with one exception, and we have the best equipped Navy perhaps without any exception.

Mr. HALE. No; I can not agree with the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, experts disagree on that.

Mr. HALE. I do not think any of the experts disagree about our need for cruisers.

Mr. NORRIS. A good many experts claim that, taking all our armament and all our vessels, and comparing them with Great Britain, with the exception perhaps of cruisers, we are ahead in every respect. We are ahead in fighting machines and submarines and torpedo-boat destroyers, many times ahead, and our battleships are probably better—at least so the experts tell me, although I am no expert like the Senator from Maine——

Mr. HALE. I do not claim to be an expert.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator would not admit that we had a good cruiser, anyway, until the bill is passed, I suppose.

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes; we have some excellent cruisers building.

Mr. NORRIS. But the experts tell me our battleships are much more efficient and in some respects outclass the battleships of Great Britain.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that is the general view of the situation.

Mr. NORRIS. It may not be. Of course, I do not know. When experts disagree I have to hunt a hole.

Mr. HALE. I said yesterday that however our Battle Fleet may compare with the British battle fleet—that is, battleships and cruisers—we accepted the provisions made in the conference of 1922, and if we did not get battleships that were the equal of those of Great Britain it was our own fault at that time. I would certainly not say that in battleships we are ahead of Great Britain.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand the Senator would not say that, and he may be right. I do not know. There are other experts who do not agree with the Senator from Maine on that point.

Mr. HALE. I have never heard that statement made.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take the cruisers alone, just the cruisers. If we consider our territory and the territory of Great Britain, I think we are way ahead of Great Britain, even in cruisers, in a war with Great Britain. She has to protect territory all over the world. We do not. She has to protect herself, an island that could not live 30 days if she could not get food in there. Her people would be starved. That does not apply to us. We do not need as large a navy, as Roosevelt said and as many other experts have said. We do not need as large a navy as Great Britain, and particularly with Canada on our north a hostage. A war with Great Britain would mean what? Great Britain could not defend the Canadian line, and while, even if we were in war with Great Britain, I would not want one foot of Canadian territory, yet it is perfectly apparent that our Army could overrun Canada. That is perfectly apparent.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We tried it about 100 years ago, and were driven back inside of our own lines.

Mr. NORRIS. When the Senator compares our condition now with the conditions which existed then, when we were fighting for independence, he is giving an illustration which, to my mind, has not anything whatever to do with the case which we are now considering.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator's pardon. We were not fighting for independence in 1812, 1813, and 1814.

Mr. NORRIS. That was our second war for independence.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We got chased out of Canada when we tried to invade it.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume that is true. I have no quarrel with the Senator on that point. But the Senator does not think that if we had a war to-morrow with Great Britain, with the small resources of Canada, valuable as they are, but small as compared with the United States, with the 120,000,000 people that we have against her 7,000,000 or 8,000,000 or 9,000,000, that she could defend herself against us?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Why does the Senator talk always about Great Britain? Of course, it is true we have had six major wars in the last 153 years and Great Britain has been in three of them, but might we not have a war with alliances of other nations than Great Britain?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; we might have such a war. I am glad the Senator called my attention to it, because I want to speak now of the navy race again, something that he has reminded me of. If we are going to build a navy big enough so that nobody can overcome us, then there is only one logical outcome, there is only one logical aim, and that is we must aim to construct a navy that will be bigger than all the navies of the world combined. I do not think there is any question whatever about it. We may have a war with Great Britain and Germany and France and Italy and Nicaragua all combined against us, and we would need a navy larger than all of them put together. But no one so far has proposed that we should do that, and yet if we enter a race against Great Britan, a possibility, it is said, where there might be war, I can see there is a possibility of a combination of the world against the United States and then we would need a navy larger than all the navies of the world put together. In other words, this race for naval supremacy has no end. It means destruction, not only to our country but to all the civilized countries of the world.

There is no logical stopping place. It is a race that every nation has a right to enter, the same as we have the right to enter it. It is a race in which all the nations will enter if we keep on. It will be a race among all the nations of the world. There is no end to it. When we build ships they will build ships. When they build ships we will build ships. There never will come a time when it will stop until by the destruction of our civilization, either by war or by taxation itself, when the people will become slaves, when our ordinary people will become peasants, when the debt of the world will be so great that it will be beyond the possibility of all the laborers and all the farmers and all the manufacturers to produce enough profit and enough money to pay the debt that this interminable race will bring upon us.

Mr. HALE. I do not know what the Senator means by a race. I do not think the Senator can persuade the Senate that when we are merely trying to bring our Navy up to a state of moderate efficiency we are indulging in a race with Great Britain.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. HALE. I can say, Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Now, if the Senator wants to interrupt me he should ask permission.

Mr. HALE. The Senator yielded to me.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not. I beg the Senator's pardon, but the Senator started right out and cut me off. If the Senator wants me to yield and will ask me in the proper way I will probably yield, even though I would like to answer the question he has already asked before I yield to him to ask another one.

The Senator from Maine says our intention is philanthropic, it is Christian, it is brotherly; we do not want to use our Navy to fight with; we have no intention of offending any other nation. I concede he is honest in that expression; I concede he believes that to be true, and so other nations have no right to complain if we build a big navy. Then, we have no right to complain if they do. So, in order to satisfy the people of other countries, we ought to send the Senator from Maine around to them when they are building battleships and have him tell them, "The idea you have that we are trying to build a big navy is all wrong; we do not mean to use it at all; we are not going to use our battleships to fight with; we are not going to load our guns; we are not going to use the ammunition; we are not going to use the naval vessels that we have built; we have built them as an emblem of peace; and you are wrong in the feeling that you have." I suppose they would all believe him and they would scrap their navies.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to have an executive session. If the Senator is willing to yield for that purpose, I will move an executive session.

HAY GROWERS IN CERTAIN COUNTIES OF TEXAS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment before the Senator from Idaho makes his motion?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator who objected to Senate bill 4818 when the calendar was last called has advised me that he has withdrawn his objection. I should like to have the bill considered and passed at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the Senator's request.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that a bill on the calendar, objection to which has been withdrawn since the calendar was last called, may be considered and passed at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 4818) for the relief of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex., which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to examine and settle, on the basis of facts and figures to be found and reported by the Secretary of Agriculture, the claims of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex., who were prevented during the year 1925 from harvesting their hay because of quarantine restrictions against the spread of the hoof and mouth disease: Provided, That the allowance made on any such claim shall not exceed the amount paid thereon by the livestock sanitary commission of Texas, pursuant to an act of the State legislature approved October 6, 1926. There is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sufficient amount, not to exceed $218,177.50, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay such of the claims as may be allowed by the Comptroller General.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there has been offered to the bill an amendment which is pending. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill, on page 2, line 7, after the words "Comptroller General," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

Provided further, That no part of the amount of any item appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 10 per cent of the amount of any item appropriated in this act on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. NORRIS. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senator from Nebraska wishes to hold his place on the floor for the opening of the session in the morning.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Can it not be understood that he will hold his place with the right to proceed in the morning?

Mr. NORRIS. I am satisfied to have that understanding.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. With that understanding, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of the War Department appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should have to object to that. I do not think we ought, while we are debating the cruiser bill, have some other bill pending. The debate could go on just the same, it is true, but I do not see any advantage the appropriation bill will gain by having that course taken, and, unless there is some particular reason why it should be done, I do not think the Senator ought to ask for it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I was merely anxious to have the appropriation bill before the Senate, so that if the debate on the cruiser bill shall be concluded to-morrow we might go ahead with the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can then get up the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I can renew the request then; that is true.

Mr. BORAH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, February 2, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, February 1, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, come richly into our hearts, for if they are full of love they are safe from the fear of evil and our dispositions are sweetened by Thy grace. Our natures are teeming with tendencies, desires, and ambitions. Help us to guard our wandering wills and subdue the threatening flames of passion; clear our perceptions and enable us to keep our manhood unstained. In our minds and hearts let there be strangely mingled enthusiasm and restraint, courage and quietness. It is the Spirit of God that makes life worth while. May we open the doors of our souls to Him, and all things will brighten with every step. Just now take our lives, so full of possibilities, and in the distant years may they count as trophies at Thy feet. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 12404. An act authorizing erection of a memorial to Maj. Gen. Henry A. Greene at Fort Lewis, Wash.;

H. R. 14920. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of Wisconsin to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across Rock River at or near Center Avenue, Janesville, Rock County, Wis.; and

H. R. 15324. An act authorizing the attendance of the Marine Band at the Confederate veterans' reunion to be held at Charlotte, N. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 16301. An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 5129. An act authorizing Thomas E. Brooks, of Camp Walton, Fla., and his associates and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the mouth of Garniers Bayou, at a point where State Road No. 10, in the State of Florida, crosses the mouth of said Garniers Bayou, between Smack Point on the west and White Point on the east, in Okaloosa County, Fla.;

S. 5515. An act to amend section 95 of the Judicial Code, as amended; and

S. Con. Res. 34. Concurrent resolution authorizing the reenrollment with an amendment of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14800) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war."

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 15848) entitled "An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WARREN, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. KEYES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HAWAIIAN BOXING MATCHES

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7200 and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Hawaii asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 7200 and agree to the Senate amendment. Is there objection?

The Clerk read the title to the bill, as follows:

H. R. 7200. An act to amend section 321 of the Penal Code.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. CRAMTON. Reserving the right to object, where did all these details as to the length of the round and the intermission originate?

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. They originated in the House.

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

OMNIBUS PENSION BILL

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD presented a conference report on the bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war, for printing in the RECORD.

INAUGURATION TICKETS—RULES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, many Members have been disturbed by an announcement made in the local press saying that the number of tickets for the inauguration for Members of the House have been reduced to four. Where this information came from I do not know, but the Members of the House will be supplied with seven tickets, as was announced several days ago.

I want to further state that these tickets will not be ready until about a week before the inauguration ceremonies. They will be distributed by the Sergeant at Arms of the House, and an announcement will be made on the floor when they are ready.

Several have called me up over the phone and asked me about tickets for the employees of the House. We expect to have a special stand, which will seat about 1,200 people, which will take care of the employees of the House and the Senate.

Now, I would like to propose a parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker, or at least call the attention of the Speaker to something that I do not think is in accordance with the rules of the House. There has been a growing custom lately that during a roll call Members go into the well of the House and create such confusion that it is very difficult for the clerks to hear and impossible for Members in the Hall to hear their names when called. In my judgment this is all wrong. Furthermore, there is no provision in the rules that provides for a Member to explain his vote or how a colleague would vote if present. I think the Speaker should call attention to these infractions of the rules.

The SPEAKER. I am glad that the gentleman from New York has asked this question. The Chair has had in mind making a statement touching the matters he mentions. In the first place, the Chair thinks that gentlemen should not ask leave of absence for their colleagues on the floor of the House. It simply consumes time. They should be in writing and blanks are provided for that purpose. Hereafter the Chair will refuse to recognize gentlemen who ask for leave of absence for their colleagues from the floor.

As to the second question asked by the gentleman from New York, whether the announcement by Members that their colleagues if present would vote so-and-so, is contrary to the rules of the House. The Chair has no knowledge of any rule that gives Members that privilege. Of course, a Member might obtain unanimous consent to make such a statement, and the Chair hereafter will ask if there is objection to making the statement.

With regard to Members standing in the well of the House during an important roll call, the Chair thinks that the rule prohibiting it ought to be strictly enforced, and will enforce it from now on. The Chair thinks that during a quorum call it would not be necessary to apply the rule very strictly, but where there is a roll call as important, for instance, as the one yesterday a large number of Members standing in the well is contrary to the rule, and from now on the Chair will strictly enforce that rule.

BILLS ON CONSENT CALENDAR

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DENISON. The rules of the House provide that bills must be on the Consent Calendar for three days before they can be called up. I am informed that that means three days in which the House is in session. Is that the Speaker's interpretation of the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the phrase "three days" means three legislative working days, that if the House is not in session it is not a legislative day, and that day, therefore, would not be included.

The present occupant of the chair has held that a holiday was not a legislative day. The Chair thinks that a day when the House is not in session is a holiday to that extent.

Mr. DENISON. I think that ruling of the Speaker was made in connection with the resolution for an investigation, filed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. He called it up right after the holidays and the Speaker held that the rule requiring seven days should elapse before it could be called up were days in which the House was in session.

Mr. SNELL. Would there not be a different situation from that of a regular holiday in the case of a week day when the House might be in session but on account of a particular situation did not happen to meet.

The SPEAKER. The attention of the Chair is called to the fact that the calendar is not printed on days when the House is not in session. Therefore, it might be physically impossible to print in the calendar the bill which it is proposed to put on the Consent Calendar. Speaker Cannon ruled on December 20, 1909, that the better practice would be that bills should be upon the printed calendar for three days in order that they might be called on the Monday provided in the rule for the calling of the Consent Calendar. (Cannon's Precedents, sec. 8117.) On February 7, 1910, Speaker Cannon again ruled as follows:

The Chair in construing this rule has held that a bill on Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be upon the printed calendar. Why? So that every Member of the House by consulting the calendar may be informed what bills are subject to unanimous consent upon that calendar.

This decision may be found in Cannon's Precedents, section 8118. That being the case, the Chair thinks that the ruling with regard to holidays not counting as legislative days ought to be also applied to days when the House is not in session.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, let us have a concrete demonstration. Next Wednesday is Consent Day. Suppose the House adjourned on Thursday until Monday, under the ruling of the Chair a bill placed on the calendar on Wednesday could not be called up the following Monday.

Mr. DENISON. That is the reason I made the inquiry.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. And in order to take full advantage of the Consent Calendar, the House must stay in session then even if it adjourned from day to day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, and in such a case the bill must have been put on the calendar on Tuesday so that it would be on the calendar for three legislative days. If the House should not be in session on Saturday, a bill, to be considered on the Consent Calendar on Monday, must have been filed on the preceding Wednesday.

Mr. LEAVITT. And what is the effect of that on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. It would have no effect on Calendar Wednesday.

RAPID-TRANSIT RAILWAY ON UNITED STATES PROPERTY IN NEW YORK CITY

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 34, authorizing the reenrollment with an amendment of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway and consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 34 and consider the same. The Clerk will report the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 34

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the action of the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives in signing the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 171) granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway be rescinded, and that in the reenrollment of the said joint resolution the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike out the following language: "at a point on Wall Street in the city of New York on the southern boundary of the property belonging to the United States and occupied wholly or partly by the Subtreasury Building, said point lying either at the southwest corner of the Subtreasury Building or in a southerly direction therefrom on a line in prolongation of the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building and extending thence northerly along the westerly wall of the Subtreasury Building, or along a line in prolongation thereof, beginning."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes. Pending the placing of the motion, I might suggest that the demand for time in general debate on this side of the House at present amounts to something like four or five hours. What is the demand on the other side?

Mr. AYRES. About three or four hours, so far.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, pending the motion, I suggest that we do not attempt to limit the time for general debate at this moment. I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] and by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and, pending that, asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be controlled equally by himself and by the gentleman from Kansas. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, in view of the statement made that there are to be 7 or 8 or 9 hours of general debate, can not the House have some assurance that the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule will not be undertaken to-morrow, so that Members might be free to govern themselves accordingly?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, the inquiry is a fair one. I am not able to say whether or not Members will use all of their time or ask for somewhat more. Apparently the time to be consumed in general debate will occupy all of to-day and at least so much of to-morrow that I think I may as well say now that if we should conclude the general debate to-morrow, I shall not ask to begin the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Idaho that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the naval appropriation bill, H. R. 16714, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16714, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the Naval Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE] 20 minutes.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Chairman, I ask the courtesy of the House in presenting my little picture that I be not interrupted.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to yield this afternoon to the walrus and the carpenter, who, as you will remember, were friends Alice encountered in Wonderland.

You will recall that meeting and at least a fragment of the conversation, which is quite familiar:

"The time has come, the walrus said,
To talk of many things.
Of ships and shoes and sealing wax
And cabbages and kings."

I have always felt, Mr. Chairman, that the walrus was discussing just one subject—the tariff. The time has come for such discussion in Congress preparatory to that tariff readjustment which we now face.

We live in the American wonderland, a wonderland of magic cities and things done with magical precision. I am going to talk to you this afternoon about one of those magic cities, of ships that bring shoes; of the present necessity for some tariff sealing wax.

I shall try to show you that "if we know our cabbages" as well as we think we do in this House, we will pay some attention to the present-day need of a few million American kings. When I say kings I mean American workmen. They are the only kings we have in this country worth consideration.

"The time has come, the walrus said." Mr. Chairman, the walrus was correct. Let me tell you something about a magic city in this American wonderland and the threat which menaces it and other magical American cities to-day, because ships bring shoes and there is no sealing wax.

THE MASTER SHOEMAKER OF THE MAGIC CITY

What Thomas Edison is to electricity, what Henry Ford is to the automobile industry, even that and just a little more is the beloved George F. Johnson to the shoe industry. Some call George F. the master shoemaker, but I feel that no such term is inclusive enough, for almost with magic hand has he translated a struggling, indifferent enterprise located in a small country town, with a single factory that gave employment to but 200 people and produced but a thousand pair of boots per day, into three good-will cities—Johnson City, Endicott, and West Endicott—all within a radius of a few miles, with an aggregate population of 30,000, with 22 factories with a combined production averaging over 130,000 pairs of shoes per day. With 17,000 workers, each with a personal interest in the enterprise, for after a dividend has been paid on preferred and the common stock, the balance of the profits is equally divided between the workers and owners of the common stock. In addition many of the workers are stockholders in the company. There has never been a strike, production is maintained, and in 1925 the workers gathered dividends amounting to nearly $1,200,000, or practically 5 per cent, on the $21,700,000 paid in actual wages in one year. George F., the beloved, as he is called, watches over and protects the interests of every employee. Food is assembled in public markets promoted by a community organization. The magic city provides three hospitals with complete medical service, without charge to the employees and their families, pensions for the old, sick relief and death benefits, a large park and playground, swimming pools, and everything to make life attractive to the workers and promote the feeling of shareholders in this great common enterprise.

The homes which are mostly owned by the employees are built and sold at cost and sometimes less. Free band concerts all bear testimony that the heart as well as the head of George F. is giving every consideration to promoting the interest of the family and generating a higher standard of living as well as an enlarged American spirit.

For the first time in the history of the shoe industry the competition of cheap labor abroad and the introduction of American shoe machinery and American methods has threatened the magic city as well as the industry, so the workers and owners of these vast manufacturing concerns come before the Congress urging that the shoe industry, in common with other American industries, shall have protection from cheap labor and unfair competition in order to promote and continue this wonderful era of prosperity we are now in, generating better homes and finer Americans in an environment healthy and wholesome.

That Mr. Chairman, is the magic city which has arisen under propitious influences and through human genius, up yonder in the country whence I come, the district I am proud to represent.

There are many unique features to this magic city, because George F. Johnson is unique; yet I know from personal observation that in a general way it fairly reflects the life, the problems, the standards, and the people of dozens of shoe-manufacturing communities in the districts represented by nearly 100 of the Members of this House.

In the manufacture of shoes alone, Mr. Chairman, 17 of our States are vitally concerned, and by actual count there are 72 of our congressional districts where shoemaking is one of the leading industries. What I am going to say this afternoon touches the lives and the welfare of many millions of persons outside my own district. Otherwise I would not take up the time of the House in this discussion, for this is a national body, and national problems are entitled to right of way. I think that what I have suggested indicates that this is a truly national problem.

The people of the magic city, like the people of the other shoe-manufacturing communities of the country, Mr. Chairman, are fairly representative of the American standard of living. When I speak of the American standard, I mean bathtubs as well as radio sets, comfortable and hygienic houses as well as automobiles; well-dressed, well-educated children as well as fur coats; and money to put on the collection plate on Sunday as well as money to spend on vacation in the summer.

In short, I am talking about a typical American cross section of modest, reasonable, but comfortable living, which includes some things which were regarded as luxuries a few years ago. Now note, if you please, they still are regarded as luxuries in many parts of the world, but are taken as a matter of course in the American standards of living.

Some of those things, Mr. Chairman—and we will not be too specific, lest we give offense to the people of other lands, where no offense is intended—strike the line of demarcation between the living standards of the American workman and the living standards of workmen and their families in other parts of the world.

Realization of that fact is fundamental in this entire tariff question which presently the Congress will face in special session with decks cleared for equitable revision.

The American workman lives as he lives because of the prosperity attendant upon the industry in which he is engaged. Just as long as that industry continues in normal prosperity, just so long will he be able to enjoy the same sort of substantial, sensible living that his neighbors in other lines of industry enjoy.

I am not one of those who believe that Congress can or should attempt to legislate prosperity. I think that is the wrong way of looking at the whole problem. Again and again on the floor of the House and in its committee rooms I have urged that it is not the function of the Congress and it is not the intent of Government to lift this group or that group bodily from a particular economic condition through artificial means. That is not the American idea. History suggests that is a trick of legislative bodies of decadent peoples.

But I think we are all agreed, Mr. Chairman, to this general proposition—that it is the function of the Congress to insure equal opportunity. That is all we are discussing when we talk about the threat which is now menacing the magic city and the American shoe business generally.

The shoe industry, Mr. Chairman, is unique among American industries in its relation to the tariff schedules of this country. It has not enjoyed the tariff protection accorded to most of the other manufacturing industries of the United States on the bulk of its output. Now and again, as tariff schedules have been revised, there have been suggestions for a protective duty on the all-leather boots and shoes which now have no protection, but the superiority of American shoe-making machinery has been such that no real economic necessity was found to exist by the tariff makers for a protective schedule on boots and shoes.

One result of that economic condition has been to stimulate the master shoemakers of this country to a high plane of mass production. They have improved their machinery both in efficiency and in total output. They have made, and are making, more shoes and better shoes than may be found anywhere else in the world.

American brains and American hands have made that possible. Sallying forth into the world arena with no protective tariff shield to aid them, they have fought a good fight and they have held their own. As long as their mechanical weapons of production were superior, they could do that, and still pay American wages in competition with the cheap-labor made shoes of other countries.

If it had been merely a case of competing on a base of labor costs alone, Mr. Chairman, the American shoe industry would have found protection necessary, because there is a vast difference between the wages paid the American shoemaker and the wages paid the foreign shoemaker. The average wage in the magic city is $1,500 a year, and I understand the average wage of the foreign shoemaker is about $300 to $500 a year, from one-fifth to one-third of the reasonable American scale.

But there was a compensating factor and that factor was the American-invented and produced shoemaking machinery, of which I have spoken. Its mass production, its high state of perfection gave the American manufacturer an advantage in production costs which enabled him to compete with the foreign shoe manufacturer and still pay American labor a living wage.

So things went along very well until the foreign shoe manufacturer, as was inevitable, began to buy and use American machines for shoe manufacture.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will my friend yield there?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not care to yield at the moment.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield when he gets through?

Mr. CLARKE. I will be glad to do so.

As long as only the American manufacturers employed the mass-production, cost-reducing machinery, they could pay American wages and still beat the foreign manufacturer with his low-paid help and his not so efficient shoemaking machinery.

But as soon as the foreign shoe manufacturer began to equip himself with that same sort of machinery, then his cheap labor, as contrasted with the high-paid American labor, became a determinative cost factor.

In other words, with the machinery equation equal or nearly so, on both sides of the water, then the labor-cost equation, plus transportation, would govern the production and marketing cost. The man with the cheapest labor could undersell the man with the more expensive labor because his production costs would, of course, be lower.

Very well, you say, but that is just a theory and that is just a hypothesis. What we want to know is what happened. Did anything actually happen to bring about this menace you suggest? Mr. Chairman, it did. It began to happen a long time ago. It is still happening. Now, it has become a threat, and because of that threat the shoe manufacturers are going before the Ways and Means Committee up yonder and ask for a protective duty. Let me show you a few million reasons why they are compelled to do that.

Mr. Chairman, here is a picture of the menace which is threatening the magic city and every other shoe manufacturing community in the United States:

	Boots and shoes		Slippers
	Pairs	Valuation	Pairs	Valuation
1923	398,929	$1,346,176	653,964	$280,014
1924	586,689	1,995,252	581,466	301,904
1925	814,643	2,429,374	180,322	130,860
1926	1,069,741	3,380,972	377,387	321,381
1927	1,477,435	5,199,656	----------	----------
1928 [1]	2,334,594	7,437,746	----------	----------

[1] Eleven months only.

In preparing this table I have begun with the Commerce Department reports of 1923, representing the general period in which the present tariff began to operate.

The importations of all leather boots and shoes duty free into the United States in 1923 are 398,929 pairs, valued at $1,246,176.

And at the same time, the importation of duty free leather slippers amounted to 653,964 pairs valued at $280,014.

The imported shoe figure of 1924, Mr. Chairman, is somewhat larger than that of 1923. It represents importations of 586,689 pairs of all-leather boots and shoes, duty free, valued at $1,995,252. And while the slipper figure is slightly smaller, representing only 581,466 pairs of all-leather duty free slippers, it will be noted that the value increases over 1923 and is $301,904.

Now we come to 1925, and what do we find?

This imported shoe is growing, Mr. Chairman; it is a size 8 now—814,643 pairs of duty free, all-leather boots and shoes imported during that year with a value of $2,429,374, in competition with the output of the magic city and the other shoe communities of the United States.

Again the slipper falls off; it is not as important, yet it represents 180,322 pairs of duty-free, all-leather slippers, valued at $130,860.

Now, it is not normal and it is not reasonable that a shoe fitting one person or one condition in one year should be two full sizes larger the next. Yet here we have the same shoe of free duty import of 1926, Mr. Chairman, and it is now a size 10. It represents 1,069,741 pairs of all-leather boots and shoes of the ordinary grades, valued at $3,380,972. And you will note the slippers are climbing again—377,387 pairs, worth $321,381.

What is happening to account for this increased army of foreign-made shoes clattering up the gangplanks to American shores—an army bigger than Pershing took to France in the first instance? Certainly it is not accounted for by an increasing army of shoemakers in foreign lands. No, Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing that can account for it. American manufactured shoemaking machinery, bought by foreign manufacturers and operated by cheap foreign labor, with resultant low production costs, is being turned against the American market.

Under the cover of those American-made machine guns an invading army of a million and more sweeps on to the American coast in 1926.

The next year—1927—as might reasonably be expected in view of what I have just pointed out, that army has increased to 1,477,435 pairs of duty-free, all-leather boots and shoes worth $5,000,000, Mr. Chairman, or nearly five times as much as the importation of 1923. In four years, then, we have watched the development of a threat which has increased almost 500 per cent. The exact valuation as indicated by the commerce reports is $5,199,656.

Only the first eight months of 1928 importations on duty-free, all-leather boots and shoes are represented by these figures.

But the size of it suggests that the progressive invasion I have been describing is a real threat and an increasing threat. In the first 11 months of 1928, 2,334,594 pairs of all-leather boots and shoes joined the army of invasion which threatens the communities of which I speak.

And that, Mr. Chairman, represented an increase of 76.4 per cent, over the 1,323,574 pairs of duty-free boots and shoes imported during the corresponding period of 1927.

The $7,437,746 represented by the 1928 imports is just that much money taken away from the American shoe manufacturing trade. Increased American demands do not compensate for it. And I ask you, Mr. Chairman, and the gentlemen of this House who have borne with me so patiently, how, when he is so threatened in the home market by American-made shoe-manufacturing machinery, plus cheap foreign labor, the American shoe manufacturer is going to be able to compete in foreign markets?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Would it disturb the gentleman to yield there?

Mr. CLARKE. It would until I complete my statement and then I will yield.

I think it is a plain case. I think everyone in this House can see that this big boot here is kicking the American shoe manufacturer, and the American shoe worker in the face. It seems to me that the threat against the magic city and the other shoe communities of America is anything but fanciful in view of the picture I have presented here.

The threat is directed not only at American business per se. It extends to the shoemaker behind the machine; to his home, his wife, his children, and the living conditions which he now enjoys. It reaches to his butcher, his baker, his clothier, his banker, and his grocer. Wherever in this country men live by the trade which is as old as civilization itself, that threat is felt.

A trampling army of duty-free, foreign-made boots and shoes is outside the walls of the magic city, Mr. Chairman.

We Americans have a habit of waiting until armies begin to move before we discuss arming. I think that it is time to begin talking preparedness for the protection of the magic city and the other boot and shoe making communities of America.

As long as our workmen enjoyed the production cost differential created by efficient American-made machinery, this was not a pressing question. Now the shoe is on the other foot, and Mr. Chairman, it is a foreign foot, aiming a swift kick at American living standards.

I listened in at the Ways and Means Committee tariff hearings the other day, and I heard my friend and colleague JOHN GARNER, of that good Republican State of Texas, tell a New England manufacturer that the Democratic theory of tariff was to give everybody the same treatment. That is the simple remedy of the situation I have described to you, so there is no partisanship involved in the discussion of this tariff schedule, at least. The shoe manufacturers of the country, who have hitherto enjoyed none of the protection accorded other industries, are now facing that economic situation which furnishes the justification for a protective tariff. In it they are asking nothing for themselves at the expense of the ranchman and the farmer. Without attempting to speak for all of them, let me put into the RECORD at this point a part of a letter I received recently from the master shoemaker himself, George F. Johnson, builder of the magic city.

ENDICOTT, N. Y., January 1, 1929.

DEAR JOHN: You want an argument from my point of view on why we should ask for free hides, while we are insisting that we shall have taxed shoes. I am perfectly frank, John, when I say that, from my point of view, free hides are not important to the shoemakers or tanners. If taxed to satisfy the agricultural interests, it will work no hardship to any particular single concern. It will simply react on all alike, like any other tax which is put upon articles of general use. The "ultimate consumer" pays the bill. All shoes will cost more money. If it satisfies the farmers (who, God knows, need some consideration from their Government), I would be the last one in the world to offer opposition.

In the matter of shoes it is a different story. We need a protective duty. There is a great deal of labor in shoes, and our Government has stated that they intend to protect the working man. And so let's have a tariff on shoes, and a good stiff one, so that we can pay our laboring people about $1,500 a year while our foreign competitor only pays $300 to $500.

I hope this is a clear, if brief, statement of the true situation. You are at liberty to use it in any way you see fit.

Sincerely,

GEORGE F. JOHNSON.

And there you have it, Mr. Chairman; a glimpse into the unselfish heart of this man who so well represents the industry now threatened by these millions of pairs of shoes that are scuffling up the American gangplanks each year in ever-increasing armies of invasion.

I think the case is plain—the case of ships and shoes and sealing wax, and cabbages and kings.

The ships bring shoes, and unless we use some tariff sealing wax, Mr. Chairman, our American workmen, who are the only kings we have in this country, are likely to come to the conclusion that we do not know our economic "cabbages." We need this tariff. If the shoe I have shown you fits, put it on.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I will say I approve of everything the gentleman from New York says in regard to protecting the shoe manufacturer against foreign competition. Last year 64,000,000 square feet of upper calfskin leather came in duty free. We have some leather industry. I am going to go along with the gentleman to get a tariff for shoes, and I was wondering if he will go along with us to get a tariff for leather?

Mr. CLARKE. Reciprocity is the life of trade. I think that is a fair proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would like to know what the gentleman thinks about it.

Mr. CLARKE. I think it is a reasonable proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Does the gentleman believe the leather industry should be protected?

Mr. CLARKE. I certainly do. I think every American industry is entitled to protection.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Where do we come in; we have cattle in Iowa and from cattle we get hides. Ought that not be protected?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I did not recognize the State from which I came by the gentleman's designation a while ago when he said the great Republican State of Texas, but he pictured the dire, yea very dire, situation in regard to the leather manufacturer and boot and shoe manufacturer and the gentleman read a letter——

Mr. CLARKE. From George F. Johnson, one of the largest manufacturers——

Mr. HUDSPETH. That this gentleman was willing to grant a small increase in tax on hides. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that when his party took the tariff off hides in 1909 boots and shoes went up 100 per cent?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know the exact situation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Well, that is so.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know about it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Now, can the gentleman transfer himself back down there to that good Democratic State of Texas and talk with the cattlemen, where it does not pay them in many instances to skin the old cow? Will the gentleman join me to secure a duty on hides—just a reasonable duty?

Mr. CLARKE. I will; and I will also endeavor to get the gentleman to vote the Republican ticket. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. He can never get the gentleman from Texas to vote the Republican ticket if he lives a thousand years. It does not pay the farmer down there in many instances to skin the cow and market the hide. I hope the gentleman will join me in giving an equitable duty on all those products of the farm and ranch.

Mr. CLARKE. I hope to be able to do so, and I hope the State of Texas will continue to be a Republican State. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; it will be a Democratic State as long as you live and then some. My district is Democratic and it produces more cattle and more hides and more beef and more goats and more sheep than any other district in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am interested in the question of shoes. I want to ask the gentleman what the total production of shoes is in this country?

Mr. CLARKE. I have not those figures to-day, I will say to my friend from Maryland, but I propose to follow up this preliminary statement later with a detailed statement of the production of shoes and of the producers who are engaged in the trade, and give you the whole picture.

Mr. LINTHICUM. There was at least one pair of shoes to each person in the country, I understand. That would be 120,000,000?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman says that in about eight months there has been imported about 2,000,000 pairs of shoes?

Mr. CLARKE. Our increase has been over 70 per cent above the figures for 1927.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is that of the higher class or medium or low class shoe?

Mr. CLARKE. That is for the medium and some of the higher ones.

Mr. LINTHICUM. One other thing. The gentleman stated, in speaking of this magic city of George F. Johnson, that the wages paid were about $21,000,000.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes. And the workers share in the capital stock and share in the profits.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I understood the profits were so large as to pay the employees 5 per cent on their stock in addition to their wages?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That does not look like hard times in the industry.

Mr. CLARKE. Here are the cold facts staring us in the face right now.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Is it not a fact that the importation of foreign shoes at this time is in its infancy, and that unless we do something it will be only a little while until the importations increase to such an extent that our local shoe industries will be put out of business?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes. In 11 months of 1928 there was an increase of 75 per cent of importations over those of the previous year, which went 500 per cent above what it was in the year before.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is the statement true that when hides and leather were put on the free list the price of shoes went up?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know whether it is or not. I am not familiar with that. I do not know as to the accuracy of that.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I thought it was so stated. Is it not true that in spite of the fact that leather and hides went on the free list, shoes have held up higher than other commodities relatively?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not think so in proportion to other commodities.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is it not true that with respect to other commodities shoes are higher now?

Mr. CLARKE. They are on about the same economic standard as other things.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Is it not true that shoes are higher? Take clothes, for example. You can buy suits of clothes and overcoats for $6.60, so advertised in the Washington papers.

Mr. CLARKE. What kind of suits are they?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. They are pretty good suits.

Mr. CLARKE. They may be good for corn husking in Iowa [Laughter.]

Mr. COLE of Iowa. We do not wear suits for that. We wear overalls and jackets.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in the absence of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] I am authorized to yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, recently the Texas Legislature passed two resolutions upon certain important questions and has sent these resolutions to Texas Members of Congress. While they deal with important subjects they are brief, and I ask that the Clerk may read the resolutions in my time, for the information of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the resolutions.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 12, by Mr. Moore

Whereas the Civil War records of the States composing the Confederate States of America were carried as spoils of war by the Federal forces to Washington and placed in the War Department of the United States, where they now remain; and

Whereas these records can now no longer be considered of any real worth to the United States Government other than historical; and

Whereas the fealty of all States comprising the Union since the Civil War has been proved and sealed by a common baptism of fire and blood; and

Whereas these old records are now but mute testimonials to the valor and courage and patriotism of southern manhood and are historical data cherished only by the States from which they were taken by the fortunes of war; and

Whereas the respective States are anxious to repossess this data and these war records for their historical value, and a worthy sentiment of proud possession: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Texas (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, requested by appropriate act to return to the respective States these war records, muster rolls, and other such documents taken from the respective Southern States at the close of the Civil War, and our Representatives and Senators in Congress are urged to secure the passage of such measure.

Senate concurrent resolution, by Mr. Berkeley

Whereas an important hearing on agricultural schedule will be held within the near future in both the House and the Senate of the United States Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas (the House of Representatives concurring), That it go on record favoring a fair and adequate tariff rate on all products of both the farm and ranch, and that we request the Members of both Houses of Congress to give careful study to such schedule with special attention to the interest of the farmer and stock raiser; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be wired to each Senator and Congressman from Texas and a copy be sent the chairman of the Agricultural Committee in both Houses of Congress.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, these two resolutions that have been read deal with meritorious subjects. I shall not speak at length upon them at this time. The first resolution deals with the Confederate military records which were seized during the Civil War and which some of the States desire now returned to them for their historical archives. I think that is a reasonable and proper request, and I hope it will receive the favorable consideration of the proper committee of the House.

The second resolution deals with the subject just discussed by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE], the question of fixing tariff rates. Our legislature has asked that when the next Congress comes to write a tariff law it shall give equal protection to the products of the ranch and the farm and the orchard as is given to the products of the factory and the mine.

In the making of tariff laws under Republican administration heretofore industry has been the favorite child of protection, and the products of the farm, the ranch, and the orchard have frequently been dealt with as the stepchild of protection by those who wrote the tariff laws. I hope that the Members of Congress from the agricultural States will see to it that in the writing of the next tariff law equal treatment and equal justice shall be given to the products of the farm, the ranch, and the orchard as is given to the products of the factory and the mine. In doing that it will be necessary to follow some sort of a consistent rule, and I think the Democratic platform which was adopted at the Houston convention is as clear and fair a declaration upon the kind of a rule that should be followed as I have seen anywhere. I am going to take the liberty of reading just a brief part of that platform. The Democratic platform declares for a tariff where the—

> Duties will permit effective competition, insure against monopoly, and at the same time produce a fair revenue for the support of Government. Actual difference between the cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguard for the wage of the American laborer, must be the extreme measure of every tariff rate.

Now, our friends the Republicans, in the presidential campaign last fall scoffed at that declaration and that rule of tariff making; but I call your attention to the fact that that platform declaration is substantially the same as the platform declaration of the Progressive Party in 1912, upon which Mr. Roosevelt, running as a Progressive candidate, received a much greater electoral vote and a much larger popular vote than did President Taft, running upon a platform indorsing the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. I want to read the Progressive Party tariff platform in 1912 and show that it is substantially the same as the Democratic Party platform on the tariff in 1928.

Mr. MICHENER. Also read the Republican platform in 1912.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Now, let me read the Progressive platform of 1912 with reference to the tariff:

> We believe in a protective tariff which shall equalize the differences of competition between the United States and foreign countries, both for the farmer and the manufacturer, and which shall maintain for labor an adequate standard of living.

That declaration is the attitude of the Democratic Party at the present time.

Now, as I see it, there are three schools of thought in this country upon the tariff question, and I may say in passing that I look upon it as a great deal more of an economic question than I do as a political question. There are three schools of thought. One school—and I think it is distinctly in the minority—is in favor of free trade. There is another school, which has too often had the ear of the people writing these tariff laws, that believes in making the rates so high that they will exclude foreign importations, prevent competition, and become the most effective agency that can be devised for monopolizing industry.

Then there is a third school of thought which believes, as declared in the Progressive platform of 1912 and declared in the Democratic platform of 1928, that the measure of tariff rates should be the difference in the cost of production at home and the cost of production abroad. If you adopt that rule, you have some measure by which to go, some measure by which you can mete out justice and you can defend a tariff law of that kind. I commend it to the Members of the next House of Representatives and suggest that they see to it that the farmers and those who toil upon the ranches and those who are engaged in the orchard business receive a square deal in the writing of the next tariff law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when the Fordney-McCumber bill was drafted all the tariff asked for by the farmers was carried in the bill with the exception of hides, and I want also to call his attention to the fact that the Underwood bill placed practically everything that the farmer produces on the free list. Is not that true?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I think that is stating the matter too broadly. I am not sure, but my recollection is that, for example, on hides the Underwood tariff law had some slight duty.

Mr. HUDSPETH. No; there was none at all.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Then possibly I am mistaken on that item, but let me say this in answer to the gentleman——

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to inject just one statement. Is it not a fact that the farmers have been worse off since the passage of the Fordney-McCumber law than they have ever been in the history of this Republic?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I do not think anyone will dispute that. It is perfectly natural, of course, and it is a perfectly fair inquiry that I be asked, as the gentleman from Michigan has asked, for a bill of particulars as to where the Fordney-McCumber tariff law does not deal fairly with the farmer. I take as my authority that it does not do so a distinguished Member on the Republican side of the House. If the gentleman from Michigan will get the Tariff Review of September, 1928—and I believe that is the leading protective-tariff magazine in the United States—he will see there an article by Mr. C. G. SELVIG, who represents the ninth Minnesota district in Congress, in which he deals with the unfairness to agriculture of the Fordney-McCumber tariff law. The subject of his article is The Tariff and Its Relation to Agriculture. I want to read to you some of the rates he uses for the purpose of comparison. In that article he appends a table which shows that the ad valorem duty on cotton clothing is 66 per cent; on wool clothing, 48 per cent; on cotton fabrics, 44 per cent; on wool fabrics, 71 per cent; whereas on corn, he says, reduced to an ad valorem basis, it is only 17 per cent and on wheat 34 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. In that table he shows that the ad valorem duty on iron and steel is 30 per cent; on copper and brass, 38 per cent; whereas on hogs, reduced to an ad valorem basis, it is 4 per cent and on pork it is 3 per cent.

No wonder that Mr. SELVIG says—> that when the McCumber-Fordney tariff bill was written the farmers did not get a square deal.

Now, that is what a distinguished Republican said, and to back up what he said he inserted in his article a table that compared the duties on agricultural products with the ad valorem duties on manufactured products, and if the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER], a distinguished Member of the House, will get that table and read it I am satisfied he will agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG] that in the writing of that tariff law the farmer did not get a square deal, and the best proof of it is the condition of agriculture at the present time. As the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] has said, I do not recall any time, scarcely, in the history of the country when, taking agriculture as a whole, it has been in a worse condition than at the present time. The situation is bad in many sections of the country, make no mistake about that.

Mr. MICHENER. And that condition commenced after the deflation of 1920.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, that condition commenced——

Mr. MICHENER. Is there any question about that?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. That condition commenced and has had its full fruition during the last eight years of Republican administration.

Mr. MICHENER. And the condition is getting better.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I wish it were, but I fear not. Only last night I read a statement from a gentleman in one of the counties out in the State of Illinois, in which he stated that no longer is it possible to borrow a single dollar on farm lands in his county. And why? Everyone knows that the value of real estate is determined by its earning power and the reason farm lands have no loan value in some sections of the country is on account of the fact they no longer have an earning power. Something must be done to correct the unfavorable situation of agriculture. The rehabilitation of this great basic industry should strike a responsive chord in the heart of every Member of Congress who is interested in the happiness and prosperity of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], and I have a very high regard for his opinion on legislative matters in general and regret as deeply as anybody here the fact that he is not to continue to be a Member of this body. [Applause.] His passing is just another example of the fact that men who have the courage of their convictions, men who think clearly and speak logically and understandingly, and have what is now called initiative, but when I lived in New England we called it "guts," are sometimes not appreciated by their constituencies. [Applause.]

Of course, I can not wholly agree with him on his attitude regarding the tariff. [Laughter.] Like many other members of his party his attitude has materially changed during the last few months. It was a very interesting spectacle during the campaign, and after the campaign to see the very sudden conversion of a great many members of the Democratic Party to the policy of a protective tariff, largely as a result of the vaccine virus that was injected by telegraph with a gentleman named Raskob on the handle end of the hypodermic syringe. I am of the opinion, however, that there are some vaccinations that do not take, and while there may be very many Democrats in the coming days when we are going to consider tariff legislation who will point with pride to the section of their platform which provides for a policy of a protective tariff, I am rather inclined to believe their old prejudices will warp their judgment and cause them to discover some unconscionable items in the bill that will prevent them from voting for it.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] is concerned, as we all are, for the return of prosperity to agriculture; however, I do not think the farmers' troubles all lie at the door of the tariff. Certain it is, that when you Democrats last wrote a tariff bill you never gave the farmer any consideration at all. His basic products you put on the free list; in fact, you skinned him alive and nailed his hide on the barn door as Exhibit A in the Underwood bill, a measure designed to be for revenue only and failed to accomplish even that. [Laughter.]

Then came the writing of the Fordney-McCumber bill following the emergency tariff bill which helped to clear up the agricultural depression, and while that did not raise prices materially, it stabilized the markets as many of those in the wool industry can testify. I do not know whether that applied to Angora-goat hair in connection with wool of the sheep or not, but at any rate the general wool industry was benefited by the emergency tariff act, and you will remember that a very prominent Democrat, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who is to be the leader on your side in the next Congress, I understand, made one of the finest tariff speeches ever made on this floor. Think of it! A tariff speech in favor of the emergency tariff act which was under consideration at that time. It has never appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but it was made in the hearing of most of us who are here to-day. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, as an old-fashioned Republican protectionist who believes that no rate of protection is too high that really protects an American industry, I always am concerned as to one particular subject and that is that the manufacturers seeking protection shall pay at least a reasonable share of their profits in good wages. Why? Because as Republicans we boast of the improved living conditions that result as a development of American industry under a protective-tariff policy. I am desirous of keeping the purchasing power of our folks who toil on the farm and in the shop as high as possible.

Being a Republican protectionist of this character, I do not want, as some Members have charged me here, to erect a Chinese wall around the country so that nobody can get in; but I do want the wall to be so high and the footing so insecure that importers are liable to break their necks trying to get in with foreign competitive merchandise [laughter], because, as I have said before, every dollar that we spend for imported goods goes into the pay roll of an importer or goes into his exchequer to pay a European pay roll.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HARDY. I yield the gentleman from New York one minute more.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas, if he will be brief.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will be very brief. How does the gentleman stand on a tariff for the old farmers' product of hides?

Mr. CROWTHER. I am for a duty on hides.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I thank the gentleman, and I am glad to know that the gentleman has come across to that view since the last time we had a tariff bill up.

Mr. CROWTHER. The gentleman is not quite fair with me; he has charged me before with taking a position against the duty on hides, and I explained my position at that time.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I know the gentleman has explained, but the gentleman did not vote for a tariff on hides.

Mr. CROWTHER. And I explained why very clearly. You will remember that there were four words left out of the hide clause—"of the bovine species."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Yes; of the bovine species. That means cattle.

Mr. CROWTHER. Of course; and that language should have been in the bill, but when it was left out that made every sheepskin, every lamb skin, and every goat skin a hide, and dutiable.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Certainly; and why not put a duty on them?

Mr. CROWTHER. Because at that time the manufacturers were paying a duty on the wool, on the skin, and we would have taxed them out of business by assessing a duty on the hides and the wool as well. The duty on wool on skins was levied according to the decision of the Director of the Customs.

Mr. HUDSPETH. We are willing to give the other man a reasonable duty, why not give the man who produces a duty and increase the number of goats and sheep in this country so that we will not have to do any importing?

Mr. CROWTHER. If that can be done by an adjustment of tariff rates, I am for it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That can be done.

Mr. CROWTHER. I believe in a duty on these raw products, provided we have a sufficient compensatory duty on the manufactured products in which they are used.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN. I hope the gentleman will insist on retaining the tariff on imported palm fiber of three-quarters of a cent a pound as protection for the Florida-grown mosses. There is a duty now on palm fiber, and our moss growers are very much interested in having that duty increased.

Mr. CROWTHER. Due to the recent election returns from the State of Florida, if it was in my power so to do, I would be most happy to grant Florida all that they need in the line of protective tariff. [Laughter.] I do not think Florida can complain of her treatment, even in her Democratic past.

Mr. Chairman, let me say this: I do not believe that the charge can be made against the Republicans that ever during a discussion of the tariff, or during the practical application of it, or in the construction of a bill, you can charge us with being sectional. We never ask a witness before the committee as to his political affiliations. No Member of the House was ever denied the duty on a commodity that was raised or produced in his territory because he was a Democrat. In the practical application of this policy we believe there should be no sectionalism—no North, no South, no East, no West—and that if it is humanly possible the effort should be made to have tariff benefits accrue to the farmer as well as to the manufacturer. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in extending my remarks, I desire to print a letter that I sent to the Manufacturers Record on December 10, 1928.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 10, 1928.

RICHARD H. EDMONDS,

Editor Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Md.

DEAR MR. EDMONDS: The recent Republican victory in the national campaign carries with it some tremendous responsibilities, and not least among the many is the necessity of tariff revision. Cement, brick, leather, shingles, and boots and shoes and hides are at present on the free list. The flexible clause offered a degree of relief to those manufacturers and agriculturists who were so fortunate as to be on the protected list, and the results have been extremely beneficial in those cases which have been adjudicated under this clause. However, the present law provides no remedy or relief for the folks who find their products on the free list. They have no avenue of escape and no door to knock at for relief. They must, in old New England phraseology, "grin and bear it." When an industry has been hanging by its eyelids for several years, as in the case of shingles and leather, they may have accustomed themselves to "bearing it," but they certainly owe us no apology for "not grinning." As an old-fashioned protectionist who believes that no rate is too high that really protects an American industry that pays its honest share of profits in decent wages I, of course, welcome the conversion of my Democratic colleagues to the policy of protection. Before they serve actively in the preparation of a tariff bill I think, in view of the hysterical haste with which they crowded to the front at the telegraphic call of their candidate, that they should serve a reasonable period of probation. I have heard of vaccinations that did not take.

I trust that we shall have a special session closely following the close of the session on March 4, and that we may revise the agricultural and industrial rates to the satisfaction of everybody—producer, wage earner, and the farm folks. It must be done as quickly as possible if it is to be of any value to agriculture in 1929. The present law has proved its value to American industry, but changed industrial conditions abroad demand that its weak spots be strengthened. Let's do it now.

Yours truly,

FRANK CROWTHER.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, the question of a more rigid enforcement of the prohibitory law is an acute one in the minds of the people of to-day. The Senate amendment, known as the Harris amendment, now in conference, provides as follows:

For increasing the enforcement force, $24,000,000, or such part thereof as the President may deem useful, to be allocated by the President, as he may see fit, to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act and to remain available until June 30, 1930.

The people will not be deceived by the parliamentary tactics to avoid a direct vote on the Senate amendment. Unanimous consent was requested to take up the bill with the Senate amendments and consider them, and if this course had been pursued a direct vote could have been secured on the Harris amendment. This was refused. The leaders in confusion adjourned the House. Instead of a direct vote on the amendment a rule was brought in to send the bill to conference, in the hope that the Senate conferees would recede and thereby avoid a direct vote on the amendment. That was the plain and only purpose of the special rule. Analyze the vote and you will find that all of those opposing the rigid enforcement of the prohibitory law voted in favor of the previous question, which had the parliamentary effect of preventing an amendment to the rule which would have permitted a direct vote on the Harris amendment, which provided the necessary appropriation to enforce prohibition.

It is argued by those opposed to prohibition that the law can not be enforced and it is maintained by those who favor prohibition that sufficient funds are not appropriated to enforce the law.

This amendment will provide funds for a fair test. It places $24,000,000 in the hands of the President and permits him, in his discretion, to allocate it to the various departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act. This answers the argument of those who have heretofore maintained that sufficient funds have not been provided. The issue here is clear-cut. Everyone in favor of the better enforcement of prohibition voted against the previous question, because that would have enabled the friends of prohibition to offer an amendment to the rule providing for a direct vote on the Harris amendment, and all those who are not in sympathy with the rigid enforcement of the prohibition law and who do not want to give the law a fair test voted against it. The question can not be dodged by a special rule. The people throughout the country will understand the vote.

I do not see how any Member of the House who is in favor of the eighteenth amendment and the legislation enacted to vitalize it can find any objection to this amendment or to the language of it. It places in the hands of the incoming President sufficient funds to enable him to utilize every department and bureau of the Government charged with the enforcement of the prohibitory law to the very best advantage. There is no question but what the sentiment of the country is in favor of prohibition.

The eighteenth amendment was submitted to the legislatures of the several States by resolution passed by Congress on December 17, 1917, and was declared to have been ratified in a proclamation of the Secretary of State, dated January 29, 1919, by 36 of the 48 States of the Union. The record shows that the legislatures of 46 of the 48 States finally ratified the amendment.

After the amendment had been ratified by the legislatures of 36 of the States, this being sufficient to adopt it, the amendment was thereafter ratified by the legislatures of the States of Missouri, Wyoming, Minnesota, Wisconsin, New Mexico, Nevada, and Vermont. And it was ratified by the State of New York on January 29, 1919, the date of the issuance of the proclamation by the Secretary of State; by the State of Pennsylvania on February 25, 1919, and by the State of New Jersey in 1922.

I call attention to these dates in order to emphasize the number of States that ratified the amendment after the proclamation was issued by the Secretary of State.

This record conclusively answers the argument frequently heard that this amendment was not adopted as other amendments submitted by Congress to the several States.

Only two States, Connecticut and Rhode Island, did not ratify this amendment.

Violent protests against prohibition are heard, particularly from the Representatives in the House and Senate from the States of Illinois, Massachusetts, Maryland, Missouri, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and Wisconsin; but all of these States, in the method defined by the Constitution, ratified this amendment.

The eighteenth amendment differs from any other amendment to the Constitution in that, first, it postponed the enactment of legislation to enforce prohibition until one year after the ratification of the amendment; second, the power to enforce the article by legislation is concurrent with Congress and the several States; and, third, the amendment was required to be ratified within seven years from the date of submission.

This amendment places the responsibility for the enforcement of prohibition upon both the Federal and State authorities.

The principal argument made against prohibition is that it can not be enforced. This I deny. Every criminal enactment by Congress or by the legislatures of the several States can be enforced by conscientious and sympathetic public prosecutors. Of course, if the prosecuting attorney does not favor the legislation and does not have the proper cooperation by the marshals and sheriffs of the respective communities, he is greatly hampered in the enforcement of the law. Generally speaking, those who argue that the law can not and has not been successfully enforced do not want it enforced. They want to embarrass the enforcement officers in every possible way.

On the other hand, some enforcement officers, in an effort to find an excuse for their failure to rigidly enforce the law, urge that they do not have sufficient funds to employ subordinate officers or that the funds appropriated are not sufficient to bring into the service employees of a high type.

It is also argued that funds have not been available for patroling the Canadian and Texas borders. This amendment provides the funds and places them in the hands of the President of the United States and charges him with the responsibility of the enforcement of the prohibitory law. He need not spend more than is deemed necessary to give the enforcement of this law a fair test.

My record in favor of prohibition is well known throughout my State. I have always lived in a part of the State of Oklahoma, which was formerly the Indian Territory, where prohibition has always been in force.

I appeared before the committee when statehood was being urged for the present State of Oklahoma in support of the provision requiring prohibition in eastern Oklahoma for 21 years from statehood, and when this was submitted to the people by the constitutional convention I voted for state-wide prohibition.

Since I have been in Congress I have consistently voted for all prohibition measures and for all appropriations reasonably necessary to enforce the prohibitory law.

I am the author of an amendment added to the Indian appropriation bill approved May 25, 1918, which had for its purpose assisting the officers in eastern Oklahoma to enforce the prohibitory law. It put teeth into the law and made the possession of intoxicating liquor in the Indian country a criminal offense.

I voted for prohibition for the District of Columbia and I am in favor of the present amendment, because I believe that this additional appropriation is reasonable and necessary to enforce the law.

I voted to override the President's veto of the Volstead Act. If this amendment is adopted and vetoed, I will vote to override it.

My judgment is that inferior courts should be established or the number of commissioners authorized to be appointed by the Federal courts enlarged and these commissioners given jurisdiction over first-offense violations of the prohibitory law. Second. I favor making a distinction between the possession of intoxicating liquor and the manufacture or sale of it for profit. If the inferior courts were given this jurisdiction and the violators of the prohibitory law were tried as soon as apprehended, it would greatly aid in the effective enforcement of the law.

Everyone knows that those who make and sell liquor for profit hope to avoid conviction by delays through postponement of their cases, in the expectation that in the meantime witnesses will have removed from the country or disappeared, and that the Government will be without testimony to convict them.

The vast majority of the violators of the law have no defense other than to rely upon technicalities and the inability of the Government to make out its case. If they were brought to trial immediately the witnesses will not have disappeared and their memories will be fresh and convictions will be almost certain.

For the second and each subsequent offense I would increase the penalty, first to one year in the penitentiary, and second, to a minimum of not less than three years. Enact such a law and place at the head of the enforcement bureau a man in sympathy with it and one in whom the public has confidence, and then appoint or elect prosecuting officers and marshals and sheriffs who are really in sympathy with the law, and with sufficient funds appropriated the law can be enforced.

It is urged that because many cases are made public in which the law has been violated and no convictions had that therefore it should be repealed. This is true of every criminal statute, State and Federal. Because criminal statutes are violated is no justification for their repeal.

I favor prohibition because I believe that it is best for the individual himself to abstain from the use of alcoholic beverages, and in proportion as you make it more difficult to secure, the less amount, of course, will be consumed. Persons addicted to the use of alcoholic liquor, who drink occasionally, will at times, unfortunately, drink to excess, and this leads to a loss in efficiency and earning power of the individual. It is an economic waste.

You no longer see officials or prominent men intoxicated in public. Attorneys are not employed who drink to excess. No one wants to ride on a train in charge of an engineer who drinks. Physicians and surgeons are no longer trusted or their services availed of who are known to be habitual users of intoxicating liquors. And these illustrations apply to all professions, laborers, and classes without exceptions. Why? The people know they are unsafe and not reliable. The public is being educated away from the use of intoxicants.

I favor prohibition because I believe alcoholic liquor destroys, in a large measure, the happiness and contentment of the home; wages are spent upon drink which should be used to clothe, feed, educate, and otherwise maintain the family; and I think no one will deny that the excessive use of alcohol does tend to destroy the happiness of the home.

I favor prohibition for the reason that, in my judgment, alcoholic liquor is directly or indirectly the cause of a very large percentage of the crimes committed and is responsible for the very great cost of our criminal courts. Most of the serious criminal cases in my district, involving assault with intent to kill, murder, or manslaughter, are directly traceable to the excessive use of intoxicating liquor. I am sure the same is true in a large measure in every section of the country. These trials are a very heavy burden upon the taxpayers of the country.

The Volstead law enacted to vitalize the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution and all amendments thereto should receive the support of every officer—municipal, county, State, and Federal—from coast to coast.

Alcohol tends to blunt the moral sensibilities, weakens the mental powers, and lessens personal efficiency. I think no one can successfully controvert that statement. It does not bring sunshine and happiness to the home, but distress and misery. Its use leads to excessive indulgence and this does not increase the attendance at Sunday schools or churches. The day of the corrupting influence of liquor and saloons has gone never to return. We must educate our children, not debase them. Let us give them the advantage of our full earning power instead of dissipating our earnings in the purchase of alcohol and passing our time in idleness.

I have never heard or read a satisfactory defense of use of liquor. The following are usually urged:

The first defense is that it interferes with our personal liberty, which, of course, is unsound, if not for our best interest, and no one contends that the use of liquor is; and, second, that it can not be enforced and this, I repeat by way of emphasis, I emphatically deny; and, third, the question of the expense in the enforcement of prohibition is urged, which, of course, is nothing as compared with the expense of our criminal courts added to the economic waste due to loss of efficiency and earning power of the individual; and, fourth, the loss of revenue to the Government, and if we are correct in our belief that alcohol tends to debase instead of uplift the individual, the Government should not be maintained through revenue derived from this source.

It is being urged through speeches made on the floor of the House and in the Senate, and throughout the country, that there is much sentiment for the modification or repeal of the Volstead Act, and many bills to that effect have been introduced from time to time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Their introduction enables various organizations to solicit funds for propaganda purposes.

I think this committee should promptly, each session, report one of these bills and place it upon the calendar for an early vote at the beginning of each session. If this were done, in my judgment, it would disclose that there is only a handful of Members favorable, upon a direct record vote, to the modification or repeal of the Volstead Act, and the public would not then be longer deceived. Until this show-down is had, the sentiment in Congress will continue to be misrepresented on the floor of the House, through the public press, by letters, and by individual conversations. In my judgment there would be an end to the solicitation of funds for the repeal or modification of this law if a report were made by the Judiciary Committee and a record vote had in the House early after the meeting of each session.

As long as this amendment is a part of our Constitution it is the duty of Congress and of the various State legislatures to enact legislation and appropriate funds to insure its rigid enforcement.

I sincerely trust that the Senate conferees will not yield upon the Harris amendment and that this amendment may yet be brought back to the House by the House conferees so that a direct test vote may be had upon it. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the committee, I am almost tempted to apologize for talking on a subject which was considerably discussed yesterday afternoon, and which was again discussed a few moments ago by the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS]. Yet the subject is so much on everybody's tongue as to excuse my offering it again for discussion. I refer to prohibition.

I desire to approach this subject from a somewhat unusual angle and to point out to you some of the peculiarities, some of the very anomalous circumstances connected with the enforcement of these prohibitory statutes.

I hold in my hand a bulletin, No. 1075, issued by the United States Department of Agriculture as a farmers' bulletin. It tells those who might read it how to make nonfermented grape juice in the home. If you will peruse the pages of this bulletin you will find the most up-to-date method of how to make not only nonfermented grape juice, but how to make wine.

Mr. TUCKER. What distillery issued that?

Mr. CELLER. No distillery issued it; it is issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. You can get these bulletins at the Department of Agriculture, and you will find that it tells you of the old methods of making wine. It tells of the new methods of making wine—how to crush the grapes, how to ferment the grapes, how to decanter the juice, how to bottle it, how to increase or decrease the degree of fermentation. It gives you the whole history of the process of making wine. You are not told with any degree of emphasis where to stop as far as alcoholic content is concerned. You are not told when to stop the process of fermentation. You simply let your conscience be your guide.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I am glad to yield to my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wonder if the Government is putting out this bulletin to offset the one put out by the wine makers telling you how not to make wine.

Mr. CELLER. Well, I am not aware of that. One thing is certain, this bulletin is surely encouraging wine making in the home. Now, it is difficult to understand how in one breath we endeavor to appropriate millions of dollars in what we consider to be an earnest attempt to enforce prohibition and in the other breath countenance the issuance of bulletins of this sort from the Department of Agriculture. The one action is surely contradictory of the other. The "drys" ought to be the first to rise in wrath against the issuance of these bulletins. They are outrageously silent.

What has been the result of these bulletins? I have gathered some data from the Department of Agriculture on the grape production, and I find that in my own State of New York and in the State of California a great impetus has been given to the production of grapes, not for table use, but primarily for the use of manufacturing wine. I presume, as the result of these bulletins which are scattered broadcast throughout the Nation, this great encouragement has been given to the art of grape growing, grape crushing, and wine making. The Department of Agriculture, Division of Crops and Estimates, gives the following startling increases in grape production:

	1918	1919	1920	1921
California	1,184,000	1,330,000	1,273,000	1,100,000
United States		1,561,000

	1922	1923	1924	1925
California	1,706,000	2,030,000	1,535,000	1,912,000
United States	1,981,171	2,227,395	1,777,722	2,064,085

	1926	1927	1928
California	2,114,000	2,364,000	2,178,000
United States	2,423,413	2,605,238	2,636,076

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Is the bulletin dated; and if so, what date does it bear?

Mr. CELLER. This bulletin, Farmers' Bulletin 1075, was issued October, 1919, and revised September, 1925. I will say, for the edification of the gentleman or any of his constituents, that he or they can get all of these wanted down in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman remarked that it seemed peculiar that the Government should issue a pamphlet like that, telling how to make grape juice and wine and at the same time try to enforce a law against the making of wine.

Mr. CELLER. That is correct.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is that much different from the practice of the Government in that it seeks to prosecute the bootlegger, and yet if the bootlegger makes some money, makes him make a return and pay taxes to the Government?

Mr. CELLER. No. I think the gentleman is correct in his observations, and the question answers itself. The practice in both instances is indefensible. Let us take another angle of the situation, and I assure you that I do not in any wise intend to be personal in my observations. I respect the wishes of any man or woman in this House with respect to their attitude toward prohibition. I have my own views and I desire at times to express them. What is the situation with reference to the production and manufacture of corn sugar in this land? Prior to prohibition there was not very much use apparently for corn sugar, because, as you know, corn sugar is the main ingredient in the manufacture of what is known as "white mule," "moonshine," "rot gut," or "third rail," beverages that used to be in common use among the negroes of the South, but which now are in quite common use the entire country over.

In 1909 there were in round numbers 159,000,000 pounds of corn sugar manufactured. In 1914 that had increased to 174,000,000 pounds. In 1919, at the advent of prohibition, it decreased to 137,000,000 pounds, only to jump, in 1923, to 537,000,000 pounds, and to 580,000,000 pounds in 1925. In 1927 the figures almost doubled. There were produced in this country 904,830,682 pounds of corn sugar. Let me tell you something very interesting about corn sugar: In 1922 a process was invented whereby they could crystallize corn sugar. Theretofore it had to be shipped, if shipped at all, in a semiliquid state, very much like molasses. In 1922 an entire new industry was developed, and its great growth was abetted by prohibition. They were able to crystallize corn sugar and send it forth in cans. It is now shipped dry, crystallized, and air-tight. That is why you have this tremendous increase in the production and sale of corn sugar. What do the people do with this corn sugar? It is notorious that all over the land they are learning in the homes how to distill spirits out of corn sugar by the mere addition of yeast and water and the distillery process. The obnoxious part of the "moonshine" process was always the dreadful, foul smell of the mash. The smell always led to detection. The crystallized corn sugar does away with the mash and its awful smell. To the corn sugar Mr. Home Distiller adds yeast and water and rye; sometimes he uses barley or malt. The mixture is allowed to ferment and then is run through a distillery apparatus, which is readily purchased in a malt and hop store, a department store, a mail-order house, or in the chain-grocery store. And so we are fast developing into a home-distilling Nation. I forgot to tell that caramel is used for coloring.

The following figures from the United States Bureau of the Census concerning corn sugar tell a tale that compels attention. The legitimate uses for corn sugar are limited to baking, ice cream, and confectionery trades. Those trades could not possibly absorb the staggering number of pounds of corn sugar now produced. Corn sugar has become the handmaiden of the bootlegger. It is strange that while the per capita consumption of sugar is declining the per capita consumption of corn sugar is tremendously increasing. I am told that "racketeers" and "higher-up" bootleggers are fighting for control of distribution of corn sugar in the Central and Western States.

You can not disregard these facts and figures. I appeal not only to the prohibitionists but to the antiprohibitionists of this House and elsewhere, and I hope you will take what I say in a kindly light. I mean nothing vindictive against prohibitionists. I want to see the laws of the country enforced. I want to do all in my power to have them enforced. I am just as desirous for temperance as any man or woman in this House, but we must not lose sight of these facts. They spell intemperance. We must not blind ourselves just because we happen to be on one side or the other of the prohibition question. We must not be impervious of the truth.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman know whether or not the bootleggers' protective association has applied to the Ways and Means Committee for an increase in the tariff to protect them?

Mr. CELLER. What is the situation with reference to another product in this country, and that is malt sirup? I could not get the exact figures from the Bureau of the Census or the Department of Agriculture, but I am told that in 1927 there were produced in this country $30,343,478 worth of malt sirup. That is the wholesale price. I do not care where you come from, from what city or hamlet or village, but you can go into any grocery store, you can go into any chain grocery store, you can go into any department store in the larger cities, and buy malt sirup, or you can order it from any mail-order house and receive it in cans. Before prohibition there was not this tremendous demand for the sale of malt sirup. The only use to which I know malt sirup was put in those days was for flavoring in the manufacture of confectionery or ice cream, or it was prepared especially to give nutriment to feeding mothers. There are foods known as Mellon's Food and several others—and that has no relation to the Secretary of the Treasury—that contain this product, but there was no tremendous demand or use for malt sirup prior to prohibition. Now there is a tremendous demand for it. Every grocery store or delicatessen store throughout the land can supply you with it. What do the people do with it? I venture the assertion that there is more beer produced, home brew, in this land to-day than was produced by all of the brewing companies combined.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. When I finish my thought. The process by which home brew is made, because of this improved method of distribution and sale of malt sirup, is quite simple. At this very moment in thousands of homes throughout the land they are taking these cans of malt sirup and dumping their contents into crocks or stone jars or boilers, or even bathtubs, and by the addition of raisins or yeast and water, by bottling it, by putting it into the ice box for 10 days, are producing what is known as "home brew." It usually contains 4 to 8 per cent by volume of alcohol. It is a very serious situation, something that should compel your interest, be you dry or wet. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman not think that by his last remarks he is contributing considerable information to the uninformed as to how they may use this malt sirup?

Mr. CELLER. Maybe no; maybe yes. I think it is information that is known to everybody in this room. I am simply giving you current history. It is known throughout the length and breadth of the land. I am sure the gentlemen know me too well to think I would in the slightest degree encourage law violators.

Mr. McKEOWN. Would the gentleman be in favor of forbidding the use of grapes, of stopping the sale of malt sirup, and such things, so as to try to have the prohibition laws enforced as the gentleman would like to see them enforced?

Mr. CELLER. No; these articles have legitimate uses. I stressed this because there seems to be an inherent, fundamental desire for those things. The people will get them whether you have prohibition or not. They will, in order to get the drink you deny them, go to these extremes. You can not stop them. No law can curb them. That is why you have this tremendous increase in the production of malt sirups, corn sugar, and such like.

Mr. UPDIKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I will.

Mr. UPDIKE. I was very much interested in the gentleman's figures. I just wondered if the gentleman from New York had any figures in reference to the amount of liquor destroyed by prohibition-enforcement officers during the period of time he has set out here?

Mr. CELLER. I do not doubt the enforcement officials in some parts of the country are doing the best they are capable of, and that a good number of barrels of whisky and barrels of beer, or whatever it might be, are being destroyed, but that does not change the situation. I am giving these facts for your mental digestion so that you who may not agree with me may offer something constructive, change a law which has not succeeded in driving out "drink." I think I am bringing to bear upon this subject something of a constructive nature by bringing these facts to your attention. There is another vexatious proposition connected with the question. I refer to diplomatic liquor. I addressed a communication to the Commissioner of Prohibition, or rather to Doctor Doran, of the prohibition-enforcement office, and I asked him whether he would be willing to give me the amount of liquor imported into this country by the attachés and the consular and diplomatic agents accredited by foreign governments to this country, and he said that he could not give me those figures although that in our customs regulations, to wit, 405, there is the following:

SEC. 405. Members and attachés of foreign embassies and legations may receive articles imported for their personal or family use free of duty upon the department's instructions in each instance which will be issued only upon request of the Department of State. Collectors will take charge of all packages addressed to diplomatic officers of foreign nations which arrived in advance of the receipt of instructions for free duty. Notifications of such arrivals should be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, the practice under that regulation is for the embassy to indicate to the Department of State that somebody in the embassy, or a number of persons in the embassy, desire to import some liquor, and then the collector at the particular port is notified that that liquor, or whatever it may be in the way of intoxicating beverage, shall come in duty free. The collectors have the figures. They compile them and send those figures to the customs department in Washington and that department in turn sends them to the Prohibition Commissioner. Now, heretofore we have always been able to procure the amount of importations of all goods and commodities which were made by the diplomats or attachés of the consular offices. We are told, for example, how much olive oil is imported, how much clothing, how much household goods, but we can not find out, I have not been able to discover, how much liquor they import. Why secrecy? Is there any need for secrecy in that regard? There must be something wrong if we are unable to get those figures, and I am sure you will all quite agree with me that they should be made public. They always were made public prior to prohibition. Why not now? Why should they be hidden from Members of Congress at this present day? Well, it seems to be quite notorious that you can get embassy liquor of all sorts. Benedictine and crême de menthe, vermouth and crême de cocoa, Haig and Haig and Dewar's Scotch, Bushmills Irish, Martel and Hennessy brandies and Canadian Club whisky, and many other foreign brands, quite readily in the city of Washington. It spills over legal barriers, and you can readily procure it in Washington.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CELLER. In a moment.

Now, trucks gather these diplomatic importations at the Canadian border, at Baltimore, and New York, and they come to Washington under Government escort. There, by a house-to-house delivery the embassies are furnished with these delectable refreshments.

We are told that just before Christmas several hijackers attacked one of these trucks and were about to deprive the diplomatic community of about $10,000 worth of Christmas cheer. And, furthermore, see how far this diplomatic immunity is carried. I recall an instance where, in one of those dance or amusement places in Washington called the Madrillon, one of the clerks or attachés of an embassy had liquor on the table. He was accompanied by one or two female companions. The agent seized the liquor. The attaché was apprehended but soon let go when he declared his identity and claimed immunity. His ladies were held. His two companions suffered when he, with diplomatic immunity, went unpunished. There is something fundamentally wrong about this discrimination. Surely it is undemocratic to deny to one group of persons that which is not denied to another group of persons. Both drys and wets can subscribe to that principle. I am sure no harm will be done to diplomacy if we take away this immunity. Our citizens want the same privileges or immunities that everyone here enjoys.

Mr. MICHENER. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the gentleman believe in the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. CELLER. I believe in the eighteenth amendment if it can be enforced. I believe in the principle underlying it—namely, temperance. Since it can not be enforced we should drop it. But since we have tried it for 10 years and have been unsuccessful there must be something wrong with it. I am trying to get some sort of modification. After 10 years we must come to the conclusion that the eighteenth amendment is unenforceable.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman, as a very intelligent man, has taken much interest in this matter, and has taken up much time in the House in the last few years in discussing this question. Does the gentleman believe in the principle involved in the eighteenth amendment?

I say, evidently the gentleman does not believe in the principle involved. The next question is this: The gentleman has concerned himself, as I suggested, with this question. Have his efforts been for the purpose of enforcing the law or for the purpose of discrediting the law?

Mr. CELLER. I offer these facts for whatever they may be worth to anybody in this Chamber or to the whole country. To my mind the only conclusion you can come to from facts of this sort is that the eighteenth amendment is unenforceable.

Mr. MICHENER. But the gentleman——

Mr. CELLER. I refuse to yield further. I am sorry. But I think I have answered the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman evidently has missed the point of my question. Certainly he has not answered it. I admire the gentleman's courage. I asked him whether his efforts have been directed to the purpose of assisting the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment or to breaking down and destroying it?

Mr. CELLER. I can not after its 10 years of failure subscribe to any kind of a doctrine or any kind of plan or procedure that seeks to enforce the eighteenth amendment, because all the money used to enforce it would be absolutely wasted and hopelessly expended. I think it is like a rope of sand. Whatever funds you might appropriate would be just as useless as endeavoring to whisper in the ear of a corps or pouring water through a sieve.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Would the gentleman be in favor of severing relations with those countries that import those liquors?

Mr. CELLER. I do not think we have to do that. If it is a matter of treaty negotiation, I think we have a right to call upon the President with the advice and consent of the Senate to deny those privileges to diplomats which are denied to me or any other citizen.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The same rights are afforded here to a representative of a foreign country as are accorded to our representatives by foreign countries, as, for example, in the importation of Boston baked beans.

Mr. CELLER. No. If only a diplomat could import Boston baked beans, I contend that the other people there should have the same right; otherwise they would have just grounds for complaint.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. CELLER. I would like to have seven more minutes. I have something that I want to disclose.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I give the gentleman seven more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I have brought here something to show the anomalous situation of which I told you at the inception of my talk. I show you here [exhibiting a bottle] something called a "tonic." It is produced and bottled in my town in great quantities. You can readily identify it in any drug store. It is alleged to be a "tonic"—maybe it is. It is good to drink. It is made from white Tokay wine and is bottled under a permit—permit N. Y. H. 13369—authorized by the Commissioner of Prohibition. What a farce! What a joke!

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman what is in that product that he is exhibiting?

Mr. CELLER. I refuse to yield to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Florida is out of order.

Mr. CELLER. I do not offer this just to be smart or even facetious. I am quite serious.

Mr. GREEN. I make the point of order that the speaker is out of order when he exhibits the contents of a bottle and does not tell us what is in it.

Mr. CELLER. I am going to tell the gentleman. I will say to the gentleman from Florida that I will not only tell him what is in it but offer him some if he wishes it. This is a wine product. It is nothing but white Tokay wine with a 20 per cent degree of alcohol, or 40 proof, as they call it in the trade, and there, I believe, is a slight trace of pepsin in it. It tastes very much like the famous French appetizer called "Dubonnet."

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CELLER. It is legal and it can be purchased in drug stores, grocery stores, department stores.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman is exhibiting something that is in violation of the law and in doing so he is violating the rules of the House. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. About one year ago a similar matter was under consideration and the Chair has asked the parliamentarian to refer to it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman from New York inform the committee that it is being sold under permit?

Mr. CELLER. Yes; it is being sold under permit. It is a lawful product for that reason.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Tell your colleague it is sold under permit.

Mr. GREEN. I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CELLER. In order to quiet the gentleman from Florida——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the parliamentarian refers to the ruling directly bearing upon this matter, when an identical matter was under consideration a year ago.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard in opposition to the point of order which the gentleman from Florida makes, his point of order that the gentleman from New York, who now has the floor, is violating the rules of the House, to quote the gentleman from Florida's own words, because he has in his hands a bottle the contents of which the House is not informed. Now, it is no violation of the House rules for a speaker to offer an exhibit, whether or not the contents of the particular exhibit or the possession of it is a violation of law. That is the responsibility of the gentleman who now has the floor. I submit it is no more a violation of the rules to display a bottle than it is to display a map. The gentleman has already stated to the committee that what he has in his hands is sold under the law under a permit and the permit is stated on the bottle.

Mr. GREEN. But, as I understand it, the gentleman from New York in his speech has stated that it contains 20 per cent or more of alcohol and therefore it is an intoxicating beverage, and if that is the case I insist that the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Every tonic contains alcohol, even hair tonic. If the gentleman will give attention to conditions in his own State of Florida——

Mr. GREEN. I will say to the gentleman that my State is dry.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is rotten wet, and that is why you have all the people there.

Mr. GREEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He does not know conditions there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have seen them. I have been in your hotels and seen it served openly.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I want to impress upon the Chair the statement made by the gentleman from New York when he says this is a drinkable substance; that it contains 20 per cent of alcohol by volume, and that it is used as a beverage.

Mr. CELLER. No; I did not say that.

Mr. MICHENER. No other inference could be drawn from what the gentleman said. He said, in fact, it was wine; he named the kind of wine and stated it had a slight tinge, as he said, of pepsin. Therefore it certainly would be intoxicating.

The Chair, I hope, is able to take judicial notice of the fact of what is or is not intoxicating, and if the Chair follows the holdings of the courts in this land to-day, he will conclude that what the gentleman holds in his hands is intoxicating. I insist that if it is intoxicating and that if it is in violation of the law of the land, to possess an intoxicant for beverage purposes, that it certainly is a violation of the rules of the House to bring that which is a violation of the law of the land into the House, and openly proclaim that he has in his possession and that there is being sold throughout the land a thing which is in violation of the law.

Mr. CELLER. May I be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. CELLER. Yes; I will be very brief.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to bring anything of an intoxicating nature into the House if it is a beverage, but as I said at the inception of my remarks this is a tonic, and that is clearly indicated upon the label on the bottle, where it is stated that it is a constitutional tonic; an appetizing, blood-building preparation. It happens to contain 20 per cent by volume of alcohol, but, as I stated, it is medicated with pepsin or peptonoids. There may be only a small trace of pepsin, but yet it is sufficiently medicated so that they have a permit. Thus, since it bears the seal of Government approval or "permit," it is perfectly legal to buy, sell, carry, drink, and bring it into this House.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I say to my colleague that if he does not watch his exhibits they will get into the hands of the drys and he will lose them.

Mr. BEEDY. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order, inasmuch as he has not addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained and the gentleman will be seated. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] has the floor on the point of order.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, as I endeavored to state before I was interrupted in an unparliamentary manner, I assure you I have no intention to bring anything into this House which might be deemed unlawful. This exhibit, as I said at the inception of my remarks, was issued under a permit that came out of the office of the Commissioner of the Prohibition Department. It is just as lawful, therefore, as any medicated product that contains alcohol that you could buy in any drug store. It just so happens I purchased this in a drug store in Brooklyn, and I purchased it as a tonic, and I was told it was a tonic, and subsequently I discovered that what was a tonic, and may be for certain purposes a tonic, is nothing but Tokay wine, a wine which we know to be fortified with brandy of a percentage by volume of alcohol of 20, medicated with pepsin or peptonoids.

Now, it just so happens that there is only a small amount, as I gather from my knowledge of chemistry and of these ingredients, of peptonoids, merely to give it flavor, a certain bitterness, probably to make it somewhat unpalatable, yet anyone tasting that beverage would have his appetite whetted for an additional quantity. It gives no sense of repletion like a food would give, and it may be unlawfully used as a beverage, but it is not an unlawful beverage. It may be abused in its use, but as it has been sold it is perfectly lawful.

But this is what I desired to convey to the membership of the House. Because of the absurdity of prohibition, the hopelessness of enforcing it——

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman is not addressing himself to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will confine himself to the point of order.

Mr. CELLER. I have concluded, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard very briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Whether this exhibit is permissible on the floor depends on the character of the exhibit and not on what the gentleman from New York thinks or says it is. This is a medicine, sold in the open market, and with the approval of the United States Government, under a permit issued by the Internal Revenue Bureau. If that is the case, there is no reason for barring it from the floor of the House or barring it from the possession of anyone. Because the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] makes assertions or allegations concerning it which are not proof or evidence of anything, that has no bearing, because the exhibit must stand on its own merits and on its own character.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman remember the decision of last year when Doctor SIROVICH, a Member from New York, wanted to use certain exhibits here? It was not a question of what was contained in those exhibits, but it was a question of getting unanimous consent of the House to produce those exhibits on the floor here.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I do not know whether the cases are on the same basis or not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I remember that very well.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, in the course of his speech, has stressed the fact that it contains 20 per cent alcohol and that something was placed in it to give it an unpalatable taste. Then the gentleman mentioned that pepsin was mixed with it in order to make it a little more palatable, and the whole trend of the gentleman's speech is that the contents of this bottle are being used as an intoxicating beverage, and therefore I contend it is out of order.

Mr. MICHENER. And, if the Chair will permit, the very purpose in bringing it here, as stated by the gentleman himself, is to bring to the House the fact that there are being vended and sold in the country intoxicating liquors under misbrand. There could be no other purpose that the gentleman could have in bringing that remedy in here, any more than if he brought in a a pound of Epsom salts or any other medicine or remedy. His real purpose in bringing the matter here is to call to the attention of the House the fact that he holds in his hands a beverage which is in fact intoxicating and which is being sold in violation of law under the permit of and with the consent of the officers whose duty it is to enforce the law.

Mr. TILSON and Mr. BLACK of New York rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this was brought in and offered merely as an exhibit to illustrate some portion of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. MICHENER. Oh, no.

Mr. TILSON. Perhaps, I was misinformed. I was out of the House when the gentleman began his remarks. But is not this the usual case of an exhibit, for which the gentleman would have to have unanimous consent, and that is all there could be to it so far as the rules of the House are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KETCHAM). The Chair is ready to rule. It seems to the Chair that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] has stated the real heart of the matter in respect to this point of order.

The Chair refers to section 427 of Jefferson's Manual where he finds this statement which seems to be controlling:

> A Member has not a right even to read his own speech, committed to writing, without leave.

And further, from section 891 of the rules, the Chair finds this statement:

> The reading of papers other than the one on which the vote is about to be taken is usually permitted without question, and the Member in debate usually reads or has read such papers as he pleases, but this privilege is subject to the authority of the House if another Member objects.

Objection has been made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] and it seems to the Chair that the statements from the manual and from the rules are controlling, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order, that if the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] objects to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] displaying this article the gentleman from New York must remove it, and the gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, the point of order should have been raised when leave was impliedly requested. When exhibits are brought here, as the manual says, as a matter of course it is admitted unless there is objection; but objection is to be made, as all objections are, at the time the exhibits are offered.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. KETCHAM). The Chair does not think the position taken by the gentleman from New Jersey is correct. The point of order was made as soon as the purpose of the gentleman was apparent. The point of order was made in proper time. The Chair sustains the objection raised by the gentleman from Florida, and the gentleman from New York will proceed in order.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, what has taken place after the point of order was sustained should be stricken from the RECORD.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LUCE). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. During the absence of the present occupant of the chair the then Chairman overruled a point of order and suggested that the gentleman from New York proceed in order. The gentleman [Mr. CELLER] having the floor has in his possession, as he has stated to the House, a bottle which contains a liquid substance which he says is 20 per cent alcohol; that it is potable, and is used as a tonic or beverage; that it is sold on the market, and he presents the bottle for the purpose of stating that the law is being violated; that he holds in his hand an article sold in violation of law.

Mr. CELLER. No, Mr. Chairman; I did not say that. I did not say it was unlawfully purchased or unlawfully sold or that it was potable as a beverage or used in any illegal fashion.

Mr. MICHENER. That was the plain inference from the gentleman's statement. The point was made that if this substance was an intoxicating beverage, as contended by the gentleman when he presented it, it would be a violation of law for him to possess it openly and flaunt it to the public. Therefore, it was my conclusion that it would certainly be a violation of the rules of the House unless the House wanted to abrogate its rules by unanimous consent, and he has not asked unanimous consent.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully take exception to the characterization of my remarks by my colleague from Michigan. I did not say, nor did I by any inference indicate, that this liquid was unlawful. I clearly indicated that it was issued under a permit.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the display of the article in question. The Chair is ready to rule, and the gentleman from New York can not proceed until the article in question is removed from the Chamber.

Mr. CELLER. I assure you, my good friends, it was not my intention to bring anything of an unlawful character into the House. Let the bottle, of course, be removed. I am sure you gather the plain intent of my bringing the tonic here. It gives dramatic carriage to the idea of the hopelessness of prohibition, its hypocricy and deceit.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the ruling of the Chair has not been complied with; the article has not been taken from the Chamber, but has been secreted in the messenger's desk. [Laughter.]

Mr. CELLER. At the beginning of my talk—and I say this for the benefit of those who were not in the Chamber at the time—I said I desired in all sincerity and good faith to point out certain anomalous situations that cluster around prohibition. It was not my purpose to be facetious or smart, but to bring out facts, and I did show by the increased manufacture of malt sirup and corn sugar and wine that there were violations of the prohibitory statute all over the land. I ask, What are you going to do about it? I ask in all sincerity. I also answered some questions by saying that prohibition is not the solution, and if it is not we must effect some changes, that we must not blind ourselves to the facts that stare us in our face and leap out at us, as it were. I say that we must experiment and try something else. Only by trial and error will true temperance come. [Applause.]

Under extension of remarks I submit a statement obtained from the Department of Commerce showing exports from Canada and imports into the United States of intoxicating beverages.

Trade of Canada with the United States

[Exports from Canada to the United States]

Alcoholic beverages	1926	1927	First 10 months 1928
Total	$21,454,310	$23,772,829	$19,312,304
Ale and beer	5,521,902	5,455,841	4,209,012
Whiskey	15,475,270	17,884,043	14,788,879
Others	457,138	332,945	314,413

Is this not proof positive of a tremendous illicit traffic—a traffic in the face of all the absurd praises of prohibition? Notice the yearly increase. The total figures for 1928, which I was unable to procure, would show a tremendous increase over 1927. This vast quantity of liquor carefully kept track of by the Canadian Government through consular invoices flows into the United States despite a rigid border control.

An examination of the Balance of International Payments of the United States tells the same story. Assistant chief of finance and investment division, Ray Hall, Department of Commerce, in the pamphlet entitled "Balance of International Payments," 1926, said:

SMUGGLING OF LIQUORS

The official balance of payments for 1924 was the first to contain an estimate of illicit-liquor imports. This was based upon a careful study of the recorded imports and exports of liquor of border and distant countries. The total was estimated at $40,000,000. This, in the opinion of some officials connected with the Customs Service, was low; but some prohibition-enforcement officers, on the other hand, challenged it as too high.

In the official balance of payments for 1925 the same figure, $40,000,000, was adopted. The estimate is necessarily a rough one, but it will be adopted for 1926 as the net sum actually paid to foreigners on this account. According to official Canadian statistics, Canada exported to the United States during 1926 whisky valued at $15,475,270 and ale and beer valued at $5,521,902, and other alcoholic beverages, raising the total to $21,454,310. Smuggling out of Canada must have increased this figure. In addition, it appears that rum running along the Atlantic coast from Europe and the West Indies is a factor.

Mr. Hall "got the devil" from prohibitionists in publishing these truths, and the figures for subsequent years are not available to us. In the pamphlet entitled "Balance of International Payments, 1927," Mr. Hall says the following:

The last three bulletins on balance of payments have contained estimates of the sums paid to foreigners for smuggled liquor, as indicated by the recorded exports of liquor by border and other countries. A section of the press stressed these estimates to the exclusion of the more important results of the surveys, and certain public officers found ground to object to such publicity. Similarly there are objections to publishing "official" estimates of the smuggling of narcotics and other articles, of understatement of imports to evade ad valorem duties, or of loss by bad debts in foreign trade. Yet this group of items has an important influence on the balance of payments; its debits are much greater than its credits. The best way to meet the situation seems to be to bulk all the estimates in the group. By this method the writer concludes that, for the special purpose of a balance of payments, a debit entry should be made in the commodity group of items of about $189,000,000 in 1927 and of about $180,000,000 in 1926. Estimated payments by American exporters to foreign consular offices in the United States for consular invoice fees are also included in this debit entry; in some instances these fees are so high as to resemble taxes.

I herewith submit a letter which I wrote Prohibition Commissioner Doran and his reply thereto:

JANUARY 16, 1929.

Hon. JAMES M. DORAN,
Commissioner Bureau of Prohibition,
Treasury Department, Washington, D. C.

DEAR DOCTOR DORAN: I have searched in vain for data concerning the amount of wines and liquors imported into this country since prohibition for diplomatic uses.

Based upon international custom and comity, duties on goods imported by consular and diplomatic offices are remitted. The Treasury Department, through the collectors, keeps a record of those importing and the amount and kinds of goods brought in.

Section 405 of Customs Regulations is as follows:

"Members and attachés of foreign embassies and legation may receive articles imported for their personal or family use free of duty upon the department's instructions in each instance, which will be issued only upon request of the Department of State. * * * Collectors will take charge of all packages addressed to diplomatic officers of foreign nations which arrive in advance of the receipt of instructions for free duty. Notifications of such arrivals should be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury."

The publishing agency for giving out the information concerning diplomatic imports is the Department of Commerce. That department gives me the following figures of imports for diplomats and consuls, exclusive of liquor:

Fiscal years:	Value
1919	$67,309
1920	72,891
1921	47,904
1922	34,339
1923	33,486
1924	45,565
1925	69,150
1926	36,353
1927	83,133

The above merely includes clothing, olive oil, household effects, etc., but no liquor. The Department of Commerce says it can not publish liquor imports because it has been refused the information by both the Bureau of Customs and the Prohibition Bureau. It published the liquor data prior to 1919 because it received the data from the Treasury Department. Amounts were then inconsequential because liquor was easily purchased here prior to prohibition.

Why the secrecy? Why the concealment? Is the amount now imported so staggering? Will publication cause a scandal?

I have discovered that most of the liquor comes by way of Baltimore—the nearest port to Washington—and armed Government guards escort the trucks into the Capital City and deliveries are made at the embassies and homes of foreign officials in a sort of house-to-house delivery.

The Washington Post recently told how two highjackers imperiled the transportation of a truck load of rare wines and liquors destined to bring Christmas cheer to several legations.

These trucks, thus guarded by United States officials, are frequently seen on the highways from Baltimore and Washington. Some come down from Canada and New York under Government escort.

It is common knowledge that much of this diplomatic liquor trickles down the throats of many who do not wear the braids of diplomacy. Diplomatic liquor is peddled all over Washington.

There is a well-defined market for benedictine, chartreuse, crême de cocoa, crême de menthe, Paul Roger and Moet & Chandon champagne, as well as French Three-Star Martel and Hennessy brandies, Bushmill's Irish, and Haig & Haig, and Dewar's Scotch whiskies.

Not long ago at the Madrillon, a restaurant and dance place in Washington, prohibition or police officials broke up a table where liquor was used. I believe two girls were arrested and later released. Their escort was untouched. He claimed immunity as an attaché of an embassy. It was his liquor. I doubt the validity of such a claim as to liquor in a public place.

However, the incident shows the extreme to which diplomatic-liquor immunity may be pushed.

I desire for public purposes, therefore, the amounts of liquor imported by consular and diplomatic officials. We may watch them drink, but, unless you tell us, we may not know how much they drink.

Very truly yours,

EMANUEL CELLER.

JANUARY 17, 1929.

The Hon. EMANUEL CELLER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have received the letter of January 16, 1929, from your office requesting that you be furnished statistics showing the amounts of liquor imported by consular and diplomatic officers for beverage purposes since prohibition.

I desire to invite your attention to House Document No. 598, Sixty-seventh Congress, fourth session, from which you will note that similar information concerning the importation of intoxicating liquors by the members of foreign missions in Washington was requested of the Secretary of the Treasury in House Resolution No. 503, and that the Secretary of the Treasury replied under date of February 13, 1923, to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that the Treasury Department could not properly give out any reports or other information as to importations of intoxicating liquors by foreign diplomatic representatives in view of their diplomatic status and the protection of persons and property which that entitles them.

As to the privileges and immunities to which a foreign ambassador, duly accredited to this Government, is entitled, I have to refer you to a letter dated February 20, 1923, addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is also included in House Document 598, and which reads as follows:

"In permitting the free entry of intoxicating liquors consigned to representatives of foreign governments having a diplomatic status in the United States, the Treasury acts in accordance with the established principles of international law and the statutes of the United States, including the provisions of sections 4063 and 4065 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

I am, sir, very truly yours,

J. M. DORAN, Commissioner.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, if the preparation of the Navy appropriation bill and its presentation to this body were limited to the consideration of ships and provisions and fuel and docks and guns and armor and machinery and long columns of figures representing money, it would be a dreary and monotonous task that your committee would be called upon to perform.

Only to one whose vision is limited can the great supply bill for the Naval Establishment carry any such meaning. The bill that you are called upon to consider is concerned with engineering and scientific investigations that are of incalculable value to commerce and industry and progress; it is concerned with efficiency in use of coal and fuel oil, with the procurement of helium, with the discovery and adaptation of means of radio communication and the development of electrical energy; it works through its laboratories and experiment stations; it is concerned with health, and through its hospitals and medical staff is making its contribution to public welfare; it is concerned with programs of relief in hours of disaster on land and sea; it is concerned with navigation, with charting new lanes for commerce, and protecting and fostering trade; it is bound up with the relationship of your country to other powers; it marks the measure of your country's responsibility in world affairs; it has to do with programs that mean peace or war, stability of civilization, or its destruction. The very money totals may be translated into terms of human life and human welfare.

The appropriations for the support of the Navy for the several years commencing with 1921 have been as follows:

Appropriations

Year	Direct	Indirect	Total
1921	[1] $433,279,574.00		$433,279,574.00
1922	[1] 410,673,289.23		410,673,289.23
1923	294,873,697.00	[2] $8,000,000.00	302,873,697.00
1924	294,456,528.00	35,450,000.00	329,906,528.00
1925	275,105,067.00	22,500,000.00	297,605,067.00
1926	302,862,378.00		302,862,378.00
1927	319,917,575.00	5,000,000.00	324,917,575.00
1928	338,826,626.22	5,945,000.00	344,771,626.22
1929	364,233,362.00		364,233,362.00

[1] Naval act only. [2] Maximum.

The pending bill carries as it is reported by the Committee on Appropriations $347,450,488 in direct appropriations, and in addition a reappropriation of $1,128,500, contract authorization in the amount of $10,000,000, and authorization to draw upon the naval supply account fund to the extent of $3,500,000.

With the exception of the current year's appropriation this is the largest bill for the support of the Naval Establishment since the conclusion of the treaty limiting naval armaments.

Should the cruiser bill that is pending in the Senate become a law more money may need to be added to the construction program, and unquestionably additional funds will be required through deficiency bills on account of our service in Nicaragua and the Orient; and probably increased expenditures on account of additional costs of submarine construction, where the earlier estimates as to costs have proven too low.

SHIPS IN COMMISSION

Next year we plan to have in commission approximately the same ships that we have in commission to-day, and to increase the number by five cruisers that are under construction and by two submarines of the V type.

OFFICERS AND ENLISTED PERSONNEL

The situation touching officers and enlisted personnel ought not to change greatly from year to year. We have at present, or as of September 30, 1928, 5,378 officers of the line as against an authorized strength of 5,499. The shortage as of that date was but 121 and the officer strength will be filled or practically filled by the graduating class from the Naval Academy of June.

Your committee believes that the officer personnel should be maintained at all times at approximately the authorized strength.

The enlisted personnel was fixed at 84,000 for the current year. For 1930 your committee has increased this number by 500 men, making a total provided for in the bill of 84,500. The increased number of men will not meet the number of men required for the complements of the ships that will be brought into commission. Rather your committee expects that the men for these ships will be found chiefly through withdrawing from active service the older cruisers and placing in reduced commission certain other ships, the wisdom of whose present full commission status is open to serious doubt.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I would like to proceed with my statement and then yield.

Mr. BRIGGS. My question is in connection with the gentleman's discussion of this point. The newspapers report that the personnel is being so cut down in this appropriation bill that they will have to retire a number of ships for the Navy. I would like the gentleman to give us some expression upon that.

Mr. FRENCH. Under the current appropriation the enlisted personnel of the Navy is 84,000. The bill that we are reporting proposes to add 500 enlisted men to the personnel of the Navy, making a grand total of enlisted personnel of 84,500. I have indicated that probably five cruisers will go into commission, two possibly in December and January, at approximately one year from now, and the other three at the close of the fiscal year, and these ships will require some 2,400 men. The two submarines will require nearly 100 men in addition. Naturally, as you cast up in your mind the number of men who will be required to man those ships, you will see that the new men—that is 500—will not meet the need. The rest of the enlisted men should be found in the present enlisted personnel. It will not be necessary to retain all of the ships in commission that are now in commission. In other words, we have at this time five cruisers of the so-called second line, old cruisers. Those cruisers ought to be withdrawn from the service, and if they shall be withdrawn there will be released more than 2,000 enlisted personnel who can be applied to the new ships that will go into commission. In addition to that, there are certain ships of the naval establishment that by another year ought to be withdrawn from the active commissioned status. It will not require very much reduction, and we have not the slightest doubt that in those ways the personnel can be found that can man the ships that will be in commission, including the ones that will be brought into commission upon their completion.

ALLOCATION OF EXPENDITURES

At the opening of my remarks I indicated that the bill that your committee is presenting at this time carries a less sum than for the current year. The difference is $14,895,364. Broadly speaking, this difference is on account of two items—increase of the Navy and major alterations of naval vessels. If the cruiser bill shall pass the situation may be altered.

For 1930, on account of the Welch Act, we have added $800,000, and we were required to include another $700,000 on account of wage adjustments in the different navy yards. For the Bureau of Engineering the bill carries $19,686,300, an increase of $264,600 over the current year. For the Bureau of Construction and Repair we are proposing $17,927,500, or an increase of $699,900 over the Budget for 1929. For the Bureau of Ordnance we have made a decrease in the amount of $282,650, and the figures carried in our bill represent an amount of $11,669,400.

Your committee has proposed money for the replacement of tools in navy yards to the extent of $1,500,000 in excess of the amount recommended by the Budget. We did this in the interest of what we believe to be soundest economy. It was disclosed to the committee that through the use of certain types of machinery and tools that are obsolete the cost of work in the placement of material has materially increased. We were advised that it was costing $2.94 in labor to put into place $1 of material, whereas with machinery and tools of modern type coupled with efficient labor, the labor cost could be reduced 44 cents for every dollar of material expended. When you think of the large expenditures that must be made annually under the Bureaus of Engineering and Construction and Repair, it is a matter of vital consideration that we give to these bureaus tools and machinery with which they can best accomplish their work.

The program that we have in mind of replacement will cover a period of two years; it will cost $3,000,000, but it will return, in our judgment, an equal amount of money value through bringing more nearly up to date the items of repair that must be met in the maintenance of the Naval Establishment.

BUREAU OF AERONAUTICS

That your committee recognizes the importance of the aviation arm of the service is apparent from the fact that for years the amounts carried for aviation are in large figures. The current appropriation is $31,956,000. The estimate for 1930 is $31,560,000. The committee recommends $31,360,000, which is $596,000 below the current appropriation and $200,000 under the estimate.

Of the funds proposed for 1930, $10,000,000 will be employed to satisfy contracts for planes ordered under the authorization contained in the 1929 appropriation, and the bill includes authorization for contractual obligations in 1930 to the extent of $10,000,000 in excess of the appropriation proposed for such year.

In addition to the direct appropriation for naval aviation there are many instances where expenditures incident to this branch of the service are lodged against other appropriations. For the past three fiscal years the entire expense incident to the air arm has averaged in excess of $44,000,000 per annum.

The fiscal year 1930 will be the fourth year of the 5-year 1,000 useful plane program authorized in 1926. The pending bill makes provision for the procurement of 273 additional planes to apply on the program, over and above 36 for the Naval Reserve, bringing the total of new planes purchased and to be purchased since the commencement of the program in the fiscal year 1927 to 1,124. When the program started there were 351 useful planes on hand and 288 on order. The predicted status at the end of the next fiscal year on the basis of the estimate is 910 planes on hand and 208 on order. The large wastage figures suggest that we have been proceeding too fast, if anything.

The bill includes $1,000,000 toward the construction of one of the two rigid airships authorized by the act of June 24, 1926. In explanation of what has been done and is proposed with respect to these dirigibles may I quote from the statement to the committee by the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics:

Following the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1929 and based on authority contained in the act of June 24, 1926, contracts for two rigid airships of approximately 6,500,000 cubic feet capacity each were made October 6, 1928, with the Goodyear-Zeppelin Corporation, of Akron, Ohio, the winner of the design competition and the low bidder. The contract price for the first ship is $5,375,000 and for the second $2,450,000, a total of $7,825,000 for the two, or $175,000 less than the limit of cost fixed by the statute.

The first ship is to be completed by April, 1931, and the second 15 months after trials of the first have been completed and the ship removed from the contractor's shed. Contract for the second ship, however, may be canceled without liability at any date prior to the preliminary acceptance of the first airship.

In accordance with the terms of the contract, the contractor is to be paid his actual costs as they are earned, following in this respect the same procedure as is customary in connection with contracts for other naval vessels. The estimated rate of these payments, based on a close study of probable labor roll and material expenditures, is approximately $150,000 per month, or a total of $1,800,000 for the fiscal year 1930. To meet this obligation it is estimated that $800,000 out of the $2,000,000 available for the current year will remain unexpended and will carry forward June 30, 1929, thus leaving the sum of $1,000,000 only to be supplied as a new appropriation for 1930.

PERSONNEL UNDER AERONAUTICS

The situation touching pilots in connection with the 1,000-plane program is not as satisfactory as we could wish.

Upon December 1 last, under the 5-year 1,000 useful plane program, we had 959 planes on hand and 192 on order, whereas on September 30, 1928, we had 520 officers qualified as pilots in both the Navy and the Marine Corps and enlisted-men pilots from both of these groups numbering 175, or a total number of pilots of 695.

On the basis of the figures that I have indicated, our program for the training of pilots is not keeping pace with the procurement of planes. Up to the present the main source of officer pilots for the Navy has been from the officer personnel. The number needed, however, is such that it can not be supplied from the officer personnel, and other ways must be found. The bill as it comes to the House from the Budget proposes a more liberal program for the training of reserve officer pilots, and for the coming year we are planning that 75 reserve pilots will be attached to the fleet. This will not meet the situation, but the plan proposed may point out the way for the solution of the problem.

THE NAVAL RESERVE

The pending bill does not propose material change in the Naval Reserve situation except as it pertains to the training of aviation pilots. The current appropriation for the Naval Reserves is $4,075,820. The Budget estimate for 1930 is $4,750,000. The committee is proposing $4,697,931, or $622,111 more than the current appropriation and $52,069 less than the estimate. The expansion proposed under this head is interrelated with the Navy's problem of developing pilots of the desired caliber in numbers sufficient for current and prospective requirements. Like the Army, the Navy, too, is looking beyond its officer school to supplement its officer-pilot personnel; but, unlike the Army, which has authority of law to commission as second lieutenants in the Regular Army qualified aviators of the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Navy, under present law, is restricted in the augmentation of its force of commissioned-officer pilots, outside of Naval Academy graduates, to yearly details to fleet air duty of such qualified Naval Reserve aviators as may consent to serve. This bill makes provision for 75 reserve-officer aviators to be so detailed during the fiscal year 1930, as against 50 the current fiscal year. It is this program and the plan to continue and possibly enlarge upon it that accounts for the additional funds proposed in the Budget and the pending bill.

The sum proposed in the Budget for the aviation branch is $1,684,834.

THE MARINE CORPS

I shall not need to discuss the program touching the Marine Corps as it is indicated in the pending bill. No material change is in contemplation.

We are carrying money appropriations for 18,000 men and for approximately the same number of officers as are provided for in current law, save as this number will be modified by attrition or by normal increase from time to time.

MAY WE REDUCE THE NAVY BURDEN?

After thus speaking somewhat of the general situation touching the Naval Establishment and indicating something of the sizable items and the programs provided for in the pending bill, I am going to ask this House to consider with me for a few minutes the question of our naval program as we look ahead.

In 1922 we entered into an agreement with other leading nations of the world for the limitation of armaments. Last week the Senate of the United States ratified the multilateral peace treaty, which has been referred to as the treaty for outlawing of war.

When I remind you, as I have done to-day, that the naval burden upon our people exacts an annual expenditure of something like $350,000,000, and when I point out to you that unless our naval programs shall be modified as we approach the years that are immediately ahead, our annual expenditure will be vastly greater than it is to-day, it becomes imperative that we pause and consider whether or not a better program may not be devised.

If the people of the United States and the people of foreign countries meant what they said when, through the means provided in the several countries in their organic acts, they ratified the multilateral peace treaty, may we not hope that the immediate corollary of this action upon the part of nations will be the lessening of the burdens of war that rest upon our peoples.

Unquestionably the peoples of the world recognize that by reason of natural resources, a population that is not crowding upon our area, the freedom that we have had from some responsibilities that have weighed heavily upon other nations, the people of the United States are in the strongest position financially and economically of all great peoples of the world. If this is true, then what I indicate in my remarks as a course that ought to be welcome to the people of our country ought to be welcome in even more impelling degree to the populations of Great Britain and Japan and France and Italy, the German-speaking peoples, and in fact to the peoples of all nations.

To-day the papers carry a statement by the chief lord of the British Admiralty, Hon. W. C. Bridgeman, indicating that Great Britain is prepared to go still further in reduction of armaments if other nations are prepared to do the same. Mr. Bridgeman says:

> I don't wish to criticize the number or size of anything America thinks necessary in the matter of cruisers, because I believe that the future peace of the world will be much safer in the hands of countries who have a generous confidence in each other than in the hands of scare mongers who try perpetually to make us believe there is grave risk of war.

I like those words from Mr. Bridgeman. They echo the thought that is in the minds of the thoughtful people on this side of the Atlantic. The people of our country generally and the people of Great Britain generally do not look upon these nations as even potential enemies. They look upon our nations as bound together by such ties of blood and community interests as will make war between them impossible. But even so, as Mr. Bridgeman has stated, when he says Great Britain is willing to cooperate with other nations looking to a reduction still further of armaments, we can not hope for a reduction by going alone. We can not attain reduction of armament of the world through the United States making an example and alone reducing. Nations have pride, and, whether it be right or wrong, this very element suggests that the program for naval armament reduction can best be carried forward by teamwork. It can best be carried forward by teamwork on the part of such countries as the United States and Great Britain and upon the part of such nations as were parties to the conference looking to the limitation of armaments that met in Washington nearly seven years ago.

Under the terms of the limitation of armaments treaty, page 3, article 21, a treaty that was entered into nearly seven years ago by the five nations of the world that at that time undoubtedly represented the overwhelming power of the world when measured from a military point of view, it is provided that a conference of all contracting powers shall convene as soon as possible after the expiration of the eight years from the coming into force of the armaments treaty. This conference will consider what changes, if any, in the treaty may be neeessary to meet new developments. This conference will fall due in 1931.

As we look forward to that conference, what have we a right to expect?

The treaty that it will be called upon to consider did not undertake to limit the number of types or the tonnage of all the types of naval craft. In tonnage the treaty referred to battleships and aircraft carriers alone. But the treaty went further and limited the caliber of guns that could be borne and the numbers that could be carried upon other types.

REPLACEMENT COST

The replacement cost of ships of the Naval Establishment of the United States, in a rough way, may be said to be upward of $1,200,000,000.

There is pending to-day in the Senate the cruiser and aircraft carrier bill under the provisions of which, if it shall be enacted into law, there will be added values of $275,000,000. You will then have a grand total of approximately $1,500,000,000, representing an investment in naval craft by the time the conference will meet, after making allowances for the striking off of present values that in another two or three years on account of obsoleteness or obsolescence will need to be removed.

This brings me to the question, What is the life of a ship? and, necessarily, the question that goes with it, What is the replacement cost?

In the Geneva conference that was held nearly two years ago different lengths of life were suggested for different types of ships. Hon. W. C. Bridgeman, for Great Britain, suggested:

	Years
Capital ships	26
8-gun cruisers	24
Submarines	15

Our own representatives to the conference suggested somewhat shorter periods of life.

Now, as a matter of fact, the life of a ship is in part an arbitrary factor. When we speak of the life of a ship we mean the period of years within which the particular ship will be effective. We recognize that ships that are filled with delicate machinery or machinery that is subject to frequent change must necessarily have a shorter life than ships of sturdier type with less intricate machinery, and where everything pertaining to the ship has come to be more nearly standardized.

If we shall say, however, that the length of the life of a ship is 20 years, it is merely to say that the entire Naval Establishment of our country, if it be kept up to a standard of efficiency suggested by that period of time, will need to be replaced within a period of 20 years.

But I said that the life of a ship is in part arbitrary. Nations are competing with each other not only in numbers of types and in sizes and in range of guns, but in machinery, in devices of all kinds that have to do with greatest effectiveness of ships as weapons of war.

Upon the basis of an average life of a ship of 20 years, the annual replacement cost of ships of the United States to-day will average close to $60,000,000.

In three years from now by the addition of ships that you are proposing to lay down the annual replacement cost will have been increased by from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000, or an aggregate total of cost for replacement will have been attained by that time of more than $70,000,000 every year.

One of the things that I could hope the conference of nations that will meet in two years from now will take into consideration would be the fixing of an arbitrary age for the life of ships of various types. If the average life could be extended to 25 years—a proposition that would be as fair for one nation as for another—it would scale down the annual replacement cost 25 per cent, or reduce it $15,000,000 to $18,000,000 annually. This would be the effect upon the Naval Establishment of our country upon the basis of its present and proposed strength.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course the replacement of cruisers now in contemplation will not occur until 20 or 22 years from now.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then that expenditure will stop.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, but the gentleman will also remember that other ships—ships of other types—will be approaching their age limit when these ships will be put into commission. In other words, in order that there may be an orderly program of shipbuilding and replacement going on, necessarily the newer ships will be put at the last end of the replacement program, while the older ones will undergo replacement first of all.

Mr. BRITTEN. And the gentleman I think will also agree with me that of all the cruisers we have, not counting the obsolete ones, none will be ready for replacement for 15 years.

Mr. FRENCH. That is true, but I am speaking of replacement that will occur for the entire Naval Establishment—battleships, cruisers, submarines, destroyers, aircraft carriers, everything that goes to make up the ships of the Naval Establishment.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does the gentleman regard that this cruiser bill now pending in the Senate is a replacement program?

Mr. FRENCH. Personally I supported the bill a year ago upon the theory that it is part of a replacement program. I believe it is a replacement program, and I think that upon the adoption of that program we ought to wipe out and withdraw from our active fleet all of these old cruisers to which the gentleman from Illinois has referred.

REDUCING NUMBER WITHIN TYPES

When the armaments conference shall meet in some two years from now, why should we not reduce the numbers of ships of different types whose numbers and tonnage are fixed in the present treaty?

Of capital ships, the United States and Great Britain are limited to 525,000 tons each; Japan, to 315,000 tons; France and Italy, each, to 175,000 tons. This is the limit following the replacement program that will be complete in 1934. Pending that program, the tonnage of these nations will approximate in relative importance the figures given. Under the terms of the treaty, after 1931, a replacement program may be begun. Some of the older ships will be replaced by new. Three battleships will be withdrawn from our fleet, not to be replaced. Adjustment by replacement and withdrawal will be made likewise in the battle lines of other nations that are parties to the treaty.

But why do the United States and Great Britain require 15 capital ships each, and why Japan 9? Why not 10 each for the United States and Great Britain and 6 for Japan, and corresponding ratios for other nations?

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. In just a moment. If we were to do what I propose, having in mind that it would mean a reduction of five capital ships for the United States and the same for Great Britain, having in mind that the replacement cost of one battleship is approximately $40,000,000, it would mean a saving to the United States Treasury of $200,000,000 for replacement of capital ships alone, the same saving for Great Britain, and a comparable amount for all the other nations that may be parties to the compact.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the gentleman believe that if the capital ships, so-called dreadnaughts, are reduced materially in number in all the navies in the world, that in the case of a government having a preponderance of merchant marine that government would not profit by such reduction?

Mr. FRENCH. Not necessarily. When you speak of reduction of capital ships you would have to equalize through maintenance of other types of ships. There is no question of the advantage to any nation of a strong merchant marine.

Mr. BRITTEN. Then, in the gentleman's estimation, call it suggestion; no, I will not say he is making a suggestion, but an argument; that by reducing the capital ships you are playing into the hands of Great Britain in having the supremacy of the seas.

Mr. FRENCH. No; not at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman spoke of the advantage to a nation of a preponderance of sea power in merchant marine, and that would mean Great Britain?

Mr. FRENCH. Other factors are to be taken into account—cruisers, destroyers, submarines, aircraft, and so forth. We would not run down merchantmen with capital ships. We would use other types and other means.

Mr. BRITTEN. Suppose we are inferior in cruisers to Great Britain; is not the gentleman playing into the hand of Great Britain in offering a suggestion of that kind to the House?

Mr. FRENCH. Not at all. I am offering a suggestion looking to the meeting of the next conference, looking to some elements that ought to be taken into consideration in the shaping of a program at that time. The question the gentleman raises will of course enter into the deliberations.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to mean that the merchant marine takes the place of capital ships in the line?

Mr. BRITTEN. The merchant ship takes the place of a gunboat in the destruction of commerce. The gentleman knows that as well as I do.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Gladly.

Mr. THATCHER. Would the gentleman state to the House his opinion on the time limit touching the 15-cruiser program, in the matter of their construction?

Mr. FRENCH. The gentleman is referring to the present bill in the Senate?

Mr. THATCHER. Yes.

Mr. FRENCH. Last year when the cruiser bill was being considered in the House I indicated my approval of the program of building 15 cruisers. I said at that time, however, that I was opposed to the time limit. I am opposed to the time limit now on principle, but I said at that time that I did not think that the time-limit feature should mean the defeat of the program. I shall tell you why. From the standpoint of economies in construction and unknown future contingencies the question of the time when a ship should be built should be left for the administration and the Congress from year to year to work out. The Congress now ought not to attempt to project itself into the situation to such an extent that it will undertake to control the amount of money that next year, two years from now, or three years from now could wisely be put into a particular program.

Your question leads me to a problem that I had hoped to discuss, and I had just as well do so now; that is the question of orderly construction of and replacement of ships of the Navy.

REPLACEMENT UPON THE BASIS OF EVEN LOAD

For the current fiscal year the appropriation bill carried for the increase of the Navy $54,775,000.

The bill this year, including direct appropriations and reappropriations, contract authorizations, carries approximately $37,000,000.

It is quite likely that it will be necessary for the Congress to appropriate additional sums to complete certain of the fleet submarines. More than that, it is possible that money may be asked for the commencement of construction of ships under the cruiser aircraft program. It is quite conceivable that the amounts appropriated for increase of the Navy for 1930 will exceed $40,000,000.

In my judgment it is of highest importance that new construction work for the Navy shall go forward upon the basis of an even cost per year. We ought to anticipate the future as nearly as may be. We ought to arrange our replacement programs as nearly as may be that an even load of replacement may be carried at all times.

This principle, I believe, is in the interest of sound policy for two reasons.

It is in the interest of sound policy from the standpoint of international relationships. There is nothing more calculated to arouse the suspicions of rival nations than a vast expanse of building program of the Naval Establishment. Witness the rivalry in Europe that began some 25 years ago. Witness the apprehension as reflected by chancelleries and legislative bodies and editorials of leading papers and magazines of the world every time an unusual program is adopted by any nation. If a definite policy may be worked out and maintained looking to an even flow of replacement of ships of our Naval Establishment, and if that policy may be so reasonable as to meet with the natural accord of other great nations, it will go far toward maintaining friendly relations between the peoples of the United States and of foreign lands.

An even program of replacement should be adopted and followed for economic reasons. It should be adopted and followed in the interest of economy and efficiency in construction. It should be adopted in the interest of and for the greatest well-being of the men who are employed in all types of work in navy yards, from the skilled designers and technical forces, upon the one hand, to the skilled artisans and craftsmen upon the other.

It is nothing less than disastrous for fluctuations to occur in the steady run of work of a type that requires training and skill and where it is not easy for those who are trained and acquainted with the work to adapt themselves to other lines in event of a slack period, and when it is quite impossible in a short period of time to build up an adequate personnel with any degree of fitness and skill for the carrying forward of the work.

When the World War came to an end there were something like 25 private shipbuilding establishments in the United States of rather sizeable dimensions. We had something like six navy yards under the Federal Government that were capable of carrying forward ship construction of types up to and including the cruiser and a less number that were capable of building ships of the first line. Then what happened?

Ship construction in the United States almost came to an end. We have to-day less than one-half the private yards in the country that we had 10 years ago. The navy yards of the Government reduced their forces, dismantled their ways, put out of use and out of repair machines and tools that with the slowing down of construction work were no longer needed.

From the point of view of economy and efficiency, it seems that I need hardly do more than call to the attention of the House the situation that I have just outlined to indicate its utter ruthlessness.

Properties in navy yards were reduced in value. As to much of the property there was no salvage. Financial disasters overtook private builders. Men who were skilled in drafting, in designing, in working out details of construction, men who were equally skilled in the shops as artisans and craftsmen of all kinds were dismissed from their employment. They sought out new activities in which they could earn a living. Their places were not taken by new employees because there was no demand. Can you realize what such a revolution as that meant to an industry from an economic point of view?

Consider for a moment the other angle of the question. Suppose that after a program of no replacements being carried forward, it should suddenly be agreed that large replacements would be the order of the day. It could well be that the present shipyards under the Navy and under private ownership would not be adequate to carry forward the work. It might well be that new companies would be organized and new plants built. Whether or not this would be true, a reaction that inevitably would occur would be the reaction of competition of companies, upon the one hand, against the Government, and the Government against the companies, upon the other, for the assembling of forces in the technical room, in the drafting room, forces of machinists and technicians capable of carrying forward efficiently and well. More than that, new men of limited experience or no experience at all would be inducted into service in blocks too large to be properly absorbed.

To barely recite that which I have outlined is again to indicate the enormous inefficiency that would necessarily flow from such procedure.

Consider the question from the standpoint of the employee of the navy yard or of the private shipbuilding concern, and what I say now has reference to all employees. Navy-yard employees are a fine type of men. Those employees are of the type on which the best in our Nation rests. They are trained; they are skilled; they are industrious; they are men who love home; they have families, many of them, and probably most of them. They are not different from other people in their desire to acquire a property that they can call home. They want to be able to make plans for community life, plans for the education of their children, plans as they look ahead for advancing on through the years, during the rearing of a family, and plans for the laying by of something for the day when the earning power may be less.

To people such as I have just referred, a program of vacillation, a program that means the building up of navy yards during a period of two or three years only to see them dismantled during another period of two or three years is nothing less than tragic and disastrous.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I say, in connection with the very interesting and thoughtful statement the gentleman has made, and one which, I am sure, will commend itself to the business judgment of the House, that it is important to remember, if we are to keep an even load of replacements, to add each year proper types of ships to the Navy, so that we can be sure of replacing in an orderly way those types of ships needed to be replaced and not add simply certain types to the exclusion of all others.

Mr. FRENCH. The statement made by the gentleman is absolutely correct and it is pertinent in connection with the time-limit principle as applied generally. I think the gentleman will agree with me, however, that so far as the cruisers that are now proposed are concerned they do constitute a type which could fit into the replacement program most economically and, very wisely from the standpoint of national defense.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that was the opinion of every member of the subcommittee.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I have no desire to interrupt the gentleman's speech, because I am always interested in what the gentleman who now has the floor has to say on these subjects, but I would like to ask this question: Is there anything in the claim that by the time we get the 15 new cruisers built they will be obsolete? For instance, the statement is made, as published in the newspapers a few days ago, that in Germany they have invented a new kind of cruiser, one that is lighter than our 10,000-ton cruisers, one that carries more guns, one that carries 11-inch guns, and one that has a speed of 20 knots an hour.

It is claimed by those who oppose this cruiser program that with such new developments under way in other nations it is believed that by the time we could get these cruisers completed they would be obsolete. Is there anything in that expressed fear, in the opinion of the gentleman?

Mr. FRENCH. I would say in reply that the question of obsoleteness is always a relative one. As to some types of ships and some methods of warfare and defense changes occur very slowly and gradually while as to others changes occur very rapidly. I think that so far as our committee is concerned the most rapid changes of all are occurring with airplanes, where, for instance, airplanes that three years ago stood as the most approved and best type are to-day so well on the road of obsolescence that the department is putting them out of service as fast as they can be replaced. Now, what I say with regard to airplanes is not true with regard to cruisers. I am acquainted with the reports in the papers touching the type of cruiser that the German people are said to have developed. I do not know any more about it than the papers have indicated, but I would say that as to a ship of the cruiser type I would hope and believe that replacement on account of obsolescence would not be so fast as to make any cruiser that we would build in another several years, in the light of the information we now have, so obsolete as to call for its being thrown into the discard before a reasonable time of life. That is a question, though, that will need to be met as we undertake the construction of the cruisers, and it is a question, too, that again goes back to the time element. The Congress and the administration ought to be free, as a matter of general principle, to take advantage of anything new that comes along to slow up, if necessary, and not be projected into a construction program just because it is said by law that certain ships must be built before a certain day. I do not think the change in major ships is going on so rapidly that we need to feel that obsolescence is going to overtake them and that they will be worthless within a comparatively short period of life.

Mr. ANDREW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. ANDREW. Are we not estopped and are not the British also estopped from constructing a cruiser with 11-inch guns, as the Germans are reported to be constructing? Are we not estopped by our agreement?

Mr. FRENCH. Under the agreement we could not put 11-inch guns on cruisers; no.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. If we adopt this program for 15 cruisers now and if some new invention should be made or some new type developed we could avail ourselves of that; could we not?

Mr. FRENCH. We could to the extent that it would be within the treaty. The particular feature, however, touching size of guns, we could not avail ourselves of because of the treaty.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman, of course, has confidence in the Navy Department taking advantage of every modern and new improvement in the construction of cruisers in the next three or four years?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, I feel that our engineers would be on their toes to see to it that our ships were the best that could be built.

Now, let me refer to the Dallinger amendment and the language of the pending bill which may have some effect upon that amendment. You will recall the language of the Dallinger amendment as being in substance to the effect that as applied to the proposed 15 cruisers the first ship and each alternate ship thereafter shall be constructed in a Government navy yard. I think my colleague, the author of the amendment, will say that is a fair summation. That amendment was added upon the floor of the House without an opportunity for any great consideration by the Members, without having had the benefit of the discussion and consideration that was given to the general bill itself by the committee that reported the bill and without being referred to the Committee on Appropriations which, generally speaking, looks after the economic factors in detail of the construction of craft for the Naval Establishment. We have carried language for several years, which language is the result of conferences between the conferees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, language that after a great deal of spirited discussion, exchange of suggestions and ideas, has finally come to be accepted as fair by the membership generally in both the House of Representatives and the Senate. That language, in general, is to the effect that no part of the moneys appropriated in the naval appropriation bill shall be available for the Naval Establishment for use or expenditure under contracts, for the repair, purchase, or acquirement, by or from any private contractor, of any naval vessel, machinery, article, or articles that at the time of the proposed repair, purchase, or acquirement can be repaired, manufactured, or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States, when time and facilities permit, and when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such repair, purchase, acquirement, or production would not involve an appreciable increase in cost to the Government. In other words, under the language we have carried the advantage would rest with the navy yards of the Government, although the Secretary could avail himself of the opportunity of awarding a contract and of making purchases elsewhere if time and facilities permitted or if considerable economies could be effected by so doing. In the bill we have brought before you we have used the same language with this exception. We have said:

No part of the moneys appropriated and/or made available for the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1930 shall be used or expended—

And so forth.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Then the object of putting the language you just speak of in the bill is to defeat the Dallinger amendment, which has been adopted by both the House and the Senate; is not that correct?

Mr. FRENCH. The object of it is to put all construction work for 1930 under a common program, a program that has been heretofore approved by the House and Senate, a program that your committee has approved as to all construction work for 1930. We could not, unless we used the language for the year 1930, bring under this provision all moneys that might be carried in other bills.

It is expected that money will be carried in the deficiency bill for certain naval work. Estimates were not ready for us to consider. The items had not been submitted to the Congress. I do not know that they will be, but if they shall be they will need to be considered by the deficiency subcommittee. We think that language ought to be carried in this bill that will permit the same principle to attach there. Again, if the bill providing for cruisers shall be passed before this bill shall become the law, then undoubtedly this language would attach to that bill and to the building program there so far as moneys carried for 1930 would be concerned.

In my judgment, I think that is the right course. I think it is the right course, as one who concedes that the navy yards ought to be given the preference, as one who thinks that an even load ought to be carried for the navy yards, as one who thinks, however, in addition to that, that this Government of ours ought to have the benefit of competition on the part of private industry of this country as industry competes with itself in the offering of bids for the construction of the ships for our Naval Establishment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Idaho has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for possibly 15 minutes, so I may round out my statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I am wondering if the gentleman anticipates, in case the cruiser bill passes, that in the deficiency bill there will be an appropriation for the plans or for the construction of any of the new cruisers?

Mr. FRENCH. I would not want to say anything on a subject I am not advised upon. I do not know.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman speaks about the competition between private yards and navy yards. Is the gentleman from Idaho aware of the fact that when the navy yards have been asked to bid upon the construction of one of these Government vessels, the officials of the yard have been ordered in every case to add a certain amount to their bid for overhead, amounting in many cases to a very considerable sum—an amount of overhead that is carried in your regular appropriation bill anyway—so that the net saving to the Government or the net cost to the Government of these vessels has never appeared? Is the gentleman from Idaho aware of that fact?

Mr. FRENCH. I am aware that, for a great many years, there has been an indefinite line between the amount that should be charged up to new work and the amount that should be carried as overhead. I want to say very frankly I do not think the overhead for an establishment ought to be added into new work as a part of the cost of the new work when that overhead must be carried on anyway.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is it true, as the gentleman from Massachusetts has said, that the department orders these yards in that connection to include that as a part of the cost in the construction of a vessel?

Mr. FRENCH. Certain yard expenses must be included.

Mr. McMILLAN. I think it is very important, if I may say so, that that should be considered and brought out if such a thing is the case.

Mr. DALLINGER and Mr. BRITTEN rose.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield first to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Is the gentleman from Idaho aware that after the debate in the House in which it was alleged that the cost of these vessels would be more in the Government navy yards than in private yards that the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee in the other body admitted the other day that after careful investigation by his committee, considering all the testimony, the net cost of the construction of these vessels in Government navy yards is at least no greater than in private yards?

Mr. BRITTEN. Following the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] a few moments ago about the overhead, it is barely possible that the Navy Department directs its estimators in the navy yards to add a certain amount for overhead that goes into the actual construction of the ships and yet is applied throughout the yards. In other words, a man may do a certain amount of work on the construction of a new ship and a certain amount of his time may be employed on repairs in another direction; and the overhead that the gentleman refers to might include items like that and, I think, properly so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not overhead; that is actual cost.

Mr. BRITTEN. I think they construe it as overhead.

Mr. FRENCH. As a matter of fact, as has been suggested, and as I suggested a few moments ago, this question involves the meaning of words used differently by different persons. The fact of the business is there are certain overhead expenses that ought to be charged to any new project that would be charged if it were in a private institution, and ought to be charged in a Government institution. The overhead to which I referred a minute ago and said I did not think should be charged, is overhead such as is incident to the invested capital in the plant. I do not think such overhead should be charged. I do not think that the cost of maintaining the plant in a way that it would need to be maintained but for the new work should be added to the new work. On the other hand, the overhead apart from that, in a rough way, it seems to me it is fair to allocate upon the new work that is cared for within the plant.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. What is the practice of the Navy in connection with the salaries of the officers who are engaged in a Government yard in construction work? Is that figured as a part of the expense of construction?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not understand that it is.

Mr. NEWTON. It does not seem to me it should be, because their salaries are going to be paid anyway, regardless of the particular task they have in hand.

Mr. FRENCH. That is true, and that would fall into the first class to which I referred a moment ago.

Mr. NEWTON. Yes; I thought so.

Mr. FRENCH. As overhead that would go on just the same whether the new ships were built or not.

Mr. DALLINGER. In spite of the fact to which I have just referred, that the chairman of Naval Affairs Committee in the Senate admitted that the net cost to the Government of the construction of a cruiser was not greater than that in a private yard, is not the gentleman from Idaho aware that those in charge of the Navy Department are not disposed to build any of the proposed cruisers in a Government navy yard unless compelled to by statute?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not think that is true. I think the gentleman is entirely wrong. The fact is we have three cruisers to-day being built in the navy yards. More than that, in yards where we are not building cruisers, in order that they would be ready to do construction work, we would need to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in improvements in order that they might be in shape to fabricate ships.

It may be a desirable thing to do that thing. I think probably it is. But it seems to me that the greatest service can be rendered by permitting the matter to be handled under the language your committee has proposed. We ought not to meet the question by removing competition, by saying that a navy yard shall build the first ship and that no private concern may compete, and a navy yard shall build the third and the fifth and every alternate ship throughout the list and private shipbuilding companies shall not compete. By such provision you will say, though not in words, that navy yards will not compete when it comes to building the fourth, sixth, eighth, and tenth and other even-numbered cruisers that will be built under the program. I want to see competition that will bring out the best in the navy yards and the best in private industry. Our country deserves it and the Navy deserves it.

Mr. DALLINGER. It ought to be fair competition, but it never has been.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. In the last construction of cruisers the navy yards from the east coast were not permitted to compete. The navy yards on the west coast got it all. New York got the hull of the Pensacola. There has been no competition between the navy yards and the private yards on the east coast, and that is the reason of this language.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. About what percentage of cost of a cruiser is chargeable to labor?

Mr. FRENCH. I think it would run about 65 per cent. Take the great repair work in the navy yards where we are doing work that is not altogether comparable, it runs about $1 material to $2.45 for labor, where we have good tools and labor that is efficient.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. In that connection would the gentleman be willing to state the percentage of cost that is to be charged for overhead?

Mr. FRENCH. I can not make that statement.

Mr. KETCHAM. Can not the gentleman make it in connection with the proposed statement?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know that it could be definitely made, because there may be varying factors attaching to different yards.

Mr. KETCHAM. The point is made that as between private yards and navy yards overhead is going on anyway in the navy yards, whether we build the ships or not. I thought it might be helpful if the statement could be made just what the overhead should be.

Mr. FRENCH. I do not think a statement that would be illuminating could be made. For instance, here is a large yard in which was originally invested ten or twenty million dollars. It may be that the yard has been running on a reduced basis for years. To build one cruiser might draw upon only a small part of the facilities of the yard. It would not be fair to charge as overhead any undue part of the expense of keeping up the yard for the building of that one cruiser. If several cruisers were built manifestly the overhead would be much less. Other yards might be used where the investment cost is much less.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All of the ordnance on these ships is made at the Government arsenals, is it not?

Mr. FRENCH. Not all of it; we purchase small-arms ammunition for target practice; we purchase a limited number of forgings, some powder, besides projectiles which we assemble in torpedo stations.

NAVAL AND MARINE ACTIVITIES IN FOREIGN AREAS

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion may I refer to the activities of the Navy and Marine Corps in connection with special services that these organizations have been called upon to render.

During the last year, as the people of our country well know, the situation in the Orient has been such as to cause gravest concern and to require the presence of expeditionary forces from our country and other countries that disorders might be suppressed; that hasty and ill thought-out conclusions flowing from the volatile state of mind of a people undergoing revolution might not react unfortunately upon nationals of foreign lands, and that in general the peace of the world to the greatest extent possible might be maintained.

In carrying forward this program, ships of our fleet have been in Chinese waters with officers and enlisted men, and officers and men from the marines have rendered service in Tientsin, Peking, and Shanghai. These forces are being reduced, already instructions have been issued for the withdrawal of marines from Tientsin, and a happier situation apparently is in prospect for the people of the Republic of China. Words of praise can not express too highly the appreciation with which the American people hold the services of the officers and men of the Navy and the Marine Corps, as with dignity and forbearance they have extended helpfulness and good will in behalf of the people of the United States.

In Nicaragua the heaviest responsibilities have fallen upon the marines.

Prior to August, 1925, for 13 years there had remained on duty in Nicaragua a legation guard from the United States marines of about 125 officers and men. Shortly after the withdrawal of this guard, in August, 1925, troublesome times again set in and by September, 1925, there were difficulties and unrest of grave portent. In 1926 a revolution was under way on the east coast. Shortly thereafter a limited number of marines and sailors were landed for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens and of other foreign people.

In 1927 the situation was more unsettled and in the late spring, under an arrangement that had been entered into following the visit to Nicaragua of Henry L. Stimson upon the part of the President, marine forces of the United States were called upon to help maintain orderly government under a program that had the approval of the people of Nicaragua who stood for law and order and decency in government.

I need not follow in detail the activities of the Government of Nicaragua as it was assisted by the marine forces of the United States in the suppression of banditry, the breaking up and dispersing of lawless gangs, and the establishment of order.

In November, 1928, carrying out a part of the agreement that had been made by the responsible authorities of Nicaragua and Mr. Stimson representing the Government of the United States, the marine forces assisted in the Nicaraguan election, an election the result of which has commanded the respect and confidence of the Nicaraguan people.

Upon the part of Nicaragua and in harmony with the Stimson agreement, the Nicaraguan Government built up and trained a nonpartisan national guard or constabulary with the assistance of the officers of the Marine Corps and the Navy, and the result of the whole program has been most fortunate from the standpoint of peace and orderly processes and good government in our sister Republic. The work that has been done by the officers and men of the marines and by the officers and enlisted men of the Navy has been at sacrifice of life and has meant an additional burden upon the Tresaury of the United States.

You will find in the hearings conducted by our committee a printed list of the names of the officers and men of the Marine Corps who have died in the Nicaraguan service, together with their home addresses.

It is most unfortunate that at any time orderly government can not proceed in every land. It is fortunate, however, that when at times the orderly processes of government are supplanted by lawless forces it is possible for peoples who are not involved to assist in the safeguarding of property, in the protection of human life, and in the restoration of government.

The naval and marine forces in Nicaragua are being reduced.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that the forces in Nicaragua are being reduced. Does the gentleman intend to convey the information that the marines are being withdrawn from Nicaragua?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; that program is going on as to marines no longer needed.

In our hearings it was indicated that the peak was reached when we had in Nicaragua on July 31, 1928, 456 officers and men of the Navy and 5,365 officers and men of the Marine Corps, or a grand total of 5,821. This number is being diminished. The naval forces have all, or practically all, been withdrawn. The marine detachments that had been borrowed from battleships are now being returned to their ships, and there will be left of the marines in Nicaragua upon the completion of this program approximately 3,650 men.

I have no doubt that with the further establishment of orderly processes this number will be reduced, and again I am sure that I express the thought of the people of our country when I say that we take deep pride in the courage, the earnestness, the fidelity, the self-sacrifice, the devotion of officers and men of the marine service and of the Navy who have contributed so conspicuously to the well-being of humanity in a sister Republic.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I was informed by the Commandant of the Marine Corps, and I should think the RECORD ought to show it clearly, that the marines that have been withdrawn are those marines that were taken from the ships.

Mr. FRENCH. That is correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And that of the expeditionary force not a single solitary marine has been recalled to date.

Mr. FRENCH. No. We will have upon the completion of the program of withdrawing of forces that is now going on approximately 3,650 marines in Nicaragua. I am not able to look into the future and indicate what the conditions will justify our country in doing and to what extent the Government of Nicaragua will need our cooperation.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The fact remains that we have 3,000 marines in Nicaragua to-day.

Mr. FRENCH. And probably will have a few more than that for an indefinite period.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The fact that Sandino, whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has at intervals defended on this floor, is resuming activities is evidence of the other fact that our marines are being withdrawn.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, now that Admiral COLE of Iowa has subdued Sandino, I say the fact remains that 3,600 of our marines are in Nicaragua and not one marine that was sent there with the expeditionary force has been withdrawn to date.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has paid just tribute to the Navy and the marines in connection with the supervision of the recent election in Nicaragua, but I am sure the gentleman would not have it overlooked that the chief commissioned man supervising the election was a very distinguished officer of the United States Army, Brig. Gen. Frank L. LaCoy, assisted by others of the military force.

Mr. FRENCH. I am sure that words of mine can not adequately express the sense of appreciation that the people of the United States feel toward the officer to whom my colleague has referred and toward the officers and men of the Marine Corps and officers and men of the Navy who have rendered this arduous and fine service in Nicaragua with such dignity and such resourcefulness and helpfulness in the maintenance of peace and good order, looking again to the establishment of orderly processes in our sister Republic.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And it is only fair to state that the Liberal Party that we went down there originally to destroy won the election and established law and order.

Mr. FRENCH. And is in highest accord with the conduct of our officers and men in the election that was held.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. There are only 15 per cent whites in Nicaragua, and if the United States Government can skeletonize the marine force in Haiti, which is all black, I am in hopes that they can skeletonize the marine force in Nicaragua, with its 15 per cent whites, and in time that we may be able to teach them how to run their own Government.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We better learn to run our own Government first.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I do not think the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that our forces went down there to destroy any particular party ought to go unchallenged on this floor. We did not go down there to destroy anybody, but to preserve peace.

Mr. FRENCH. The statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE] is, of course, correct. The Government of the United States has never sought and never has had a part in the political differences of the people of Nicaragua. The thing that we are interested in and were interested in is protection of our nationals and their interests, and protection of the nationals of other countries and preventing, if possible, a lawless condition to exist and to expand, threatening the peace of the Americas, and led by lawless bandits who respected not the rights of others, even the people of their own land.

Mr LAGUARDIA. And that was exactly the way the Liberal Party was characterized and described when we first sent the marines down there.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is my understanding also that the marines are remaining in Nicaragua at the request of the President of the Liberal government.

Mr. FRENCH. Not only the Liberal government but the outgoing government were in accord in inviting the forces of the United States to go there and take part in preserving order and in conducting the election.

Mr. KETCHAM. In that very connection, is it not interesting to observe repeatedly in the case that the Conservatives are not so greatly concerned in having the marines remain there, but the Liberals are?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. And if it is not a fact that the presence of American marines in Nicaragua was followed by the settlement and cessation practically of a bloody revolution in that country?

Mr. FRENCH. In my judgment that must be the inevitable conclusion of thoughtful people.

May I close, as I did one year ago, with the assurance to this House that through the contact and touch the members of your committee have at all times with the Naval Establishment we have pride in its officers, we have pride in its personnel, we have pride in the spirit that permeates the institution itself and that has become a part of its splendid traditions. I thank you for the fine attention you have accorded me. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, in view of certain references made to the senior Senator from Georgia in the discussion of House Resolution 303 on yesterday, and a recent article published in the Washington Post, I wish to read into the RECORD three brief editorials from three Georgia newspapers. I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks, and I wish to insert in the RECORD those three short editorials.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks——

Mr. TILSON. May I hear that request repeated? I did not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks and to insert therein three short editorials.

Mr. TILSON. I wish the gentleman would reserve his request until we are in the House instead of in committee.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will not object, because I will feel forced to ask for sufficient time in which to read them.

Mr. TILSON. Of course, the gentleman could not read them if anybody objected, even if he had the time. This question of putting editorials in the RECORD is one to which several Members of the House have consistently objected, and the gentleman ought not to ask that privilege in the Committee of the Whole. If the gentleman will wait until we are in the House, I shall make no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I will say this is not an unusual request.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has been done a great many times.

Mr. TILSON. But it ought not to be done in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BEGG. One minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is in the control of the gentleman from Idaho and the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. BEGG. I will ask the gentleman from Idaho to yield one minute in order for me to ask a question.

Mr. AYRES. I yield one minute additional.

Mr. BEGG. I would like——

Mr. COX. For the present, I withdraw the request.

Mr. TILSON. I hope the gentleman will do so for the present.

Mr. BEGG. Is it not, in fact, a violation of the rule for a Member to ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the committee at any time?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not if the Member has the floor at the time.

Mr. BEGG. It is my impression that it is a fact. I know the Speaker has made a statement repeatedly to that effect.

Mr. TILSON. A Member may ask unanimous consent to extend his remarks in committee, but no general request can be made in committee giving to Members generally that privilege. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] is no doubt within his rights in asking unanimous consent to extend.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is not here.

Mr. TILSON. He had an opportunity to be here.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Is not this a fact: Did not the Speaker at a former session of Congress state that it was desirable that Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole should not submit unanimous-consent requests to extend remarks on subjects other than those under debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MAPES. Then I make it as a statement of my recollection of the matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this afternoon has been to a very considerable degree confined to the discussion of the tariff. I rise to discuss that question also, but propose to confine my discussion to one great industry which is in need at the present time of rehabilitation and to the same kind of treatment that is extended by the Congress and the Nation to other great industries. I refer, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, to the oil industry.

The oil industry has in the last few years grown to be one of the most important in America. It is also one of the most necessary. For the last two years, however, as a whole it has suffered a depression that has been felt by labor, by the producers of crude petroleum, and the farmers and landowners from whose land oil is produced.

This depression has resulted from two causes. One of them has been overproduction in this country, caused mainly by the peculiar conditions under which oil is produced. In the last few months leaders of the industry have sought, through the American Petroleum Institute, the Mid-Continent Oil & Gas Association, and other organizations, to adopt a policy of conservation that will be beneficial and for which they are to be congratulated. In this effort they deserve the support of every public official and the public.

Another and very important reason for this condition comes about on account of the large amount of oil imported into this country from Mexico, Venezuela, and other foreign countries. This oil comes into the United States free of duty. It can be produced with the cheap labor of these foreign countries at a less cost than can our oil, with the result that, in my opinion, there can be no great revival of our American oil industry until it is protected from the unwarranted competition just referred to.

To adjust this condition, on December 3, 1928, I introduced in the Congress H. R. 14462, a bill to amend the tariff act of 1922 by placing crude mineral oils on the dutiable list.

In the placing of a protective tariff on any commodity it is but natural that we ask to what extent are importations interfering with American production? The records disclose that about 77,000,000 barrels of crude oil are coming into this country each year and on it the importers are paying no duty. The records of the Department of Commerce show that for the six months ending November 30, 1928, the imports and exports of crude and refined oil were:

	Barrels
Exports, from Atlantic coast only:
Crude	312
Refined	11,170,812
Imports for same period:
Crude	35,269,961
Refined	3,611,660

Naturally this great flood of duty-free oil with our comparatively small amount of exports is of great injury to the American industry, and this also discloses a source of revenue to the Government and a protection to an American industry that would be of benefit to both.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I understood the gentleman a moment ago gave the exports and imports of oil from and to the Atlantic coast.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Have you the figures covering the imports to and exports from the Pacific coast?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. No. These figures do not include the exports from the west coast.

Mr. BARBOUR. Do the figures apply to oil imported to America and exported from the Atlantic coast?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes. My figures apply to the total amount brought into this country, and the total amount that was exported from Atlantic coast ports only.

Mr. BARBOUR. Most of our exports of oil go from the Pacific coast, do they not?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I do not know what the proportion is.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am very much interested in the question which the gentleman is discussing. May I ask him a further question?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I shall be glad if the gentleman will.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it the gentleman's intention to urge a protective tariff on oil in the coming tariff bill?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARBOUR. May I ask the gentleman this question: What is the attitude of the oil producers of Oklahoma touching the proposal to place a protective tariff on oil?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I have been told by those whose interests lie with the importers that they are in opposition, and that the independents, whose full interest in the industry is American oil entirely, are in favor of the tariff.

Mr. BARBOUR. I am interested in this because I represent a large oil-producing district in California. I have received communications advocating a protective tariff on oil, but so far as I am advised, none of those requests have come from oil producers. I am interested in knowing what the situation is in the gentleman's State.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman from California that I introduced the bill I referred to for the purpose of bringing the matter before the Committee on Ways and Means. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, has informed me that, either on February 20, 21, or 22, the committee will give anyone interested an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman permit one other question?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Are the independent producers of Oklahoma organized?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The oil producers in Oklahoma, independent and others, are practically all members of the same organization, the Mid-Continent Oil & Gas Association.

Mr. BARBOUR. Is it their intention to support this proposal?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I have had several letters and telegrams from large independent producers in which they say they are supporting the measure and will probably be here at the time I mentioned.

Mr. BARBOUR. Can the gentleman state what the attitude of the American Petroleum Institute is?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I understand from the newspaper reports that Mr. Reeser, the president of the American Petroleum Institute, has stated that he thought the plan of conservation would be sufficient and did not know that a tariff would be necessary or beneficial.

Mr. BARBOUR. Would the gentleman express an opinion as to that suggestion? That suggestion has been made to me, that we could accomplish the same thing by not producing so much oil at this time; in other words, by conserving it in the ground.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Let me say to the gentleman on that point that in the last year or two in Oklahoma through a plan of conservation we have reduced the production at times approximately 300,000 barrels a day, but at the same time the imports on the Atlantic coast have increased very materially. A great many producers believe they might bring about a plan of conservation that would remedy the situation. But I call attention to the fact that since the American Petroleum Institute meeting, since the matter has been under discussion, the royalty owners in Kansas, in Texas, and in Oklahoma have had meetings and have protested against the State legislature in either of their States entering into any attempt to pass legislation that would control the production of oil.

Mr. BARBOUR. The royalty owners are the people who own the land and have leased it on a royalty basis to the producers.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. They are the farmers and those who have bought an interest in royalties of the farmers. But it is my contention that both conservation and this tariff will be needed before the oil industry is put on its feet again.

Mr. BARBOUR. I want to say that the gentleman has raised a very important question. I have been seeking information in regard to it and I appreciate the information the gentleman has given us.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman has given us some very interesting information. Can the gentleman give us some idea as to what our natural resources are in oil and about how many years it will be before it will all be consumed?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Well, let me say to the gentleman in answer to that question that it is about like the question of how old is Ann, for I call his attention to this fact, that 10 years ago the geologists made estimates as to the amount of oil in the earth at that time, and since then we have taken out of the earth more oil than they estimated was in it.

Mr. BARBOUR. We are continually bringing in new fields.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes. That is true in your field in Los Angeles, where less than two months ago they went 1,000 feet deeper than they have ever gone before and brought in larger wells.

Mr. BARBOUR. I will say to the gentleman that is not in Los Angeles but in the San Joaquin Valley of California.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. The same is true at Wichita, Kans., and the same is true at Oklahoma City, where 10 years ago they imagined there was no oil and it was condemned, but recently, close to Wichita and close to Oklahoma City, they have brought in wells producing from 5,000 to 8,000 barrels a day.

Mr. NEWTON. Then the gentleman feels there is no limit to the oil supply?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. On that point I think it is problematical. If the gentleman is referring to the conservation of natural resources, I call his attention to the fact that in this country there are billions of pounds of shale that will produce oil and science will bring forth an economical way of producing oil out of that shale. Further than that, science is bringing forth now substitutes for gasoline and the day may not be far distant when gasoline will not be in demand, and then, if we follow the argument made by some, of conserving our American oil and using that from foreign countries, we might find that through this policy we will have left millions and millions of dollars' worth of natural resources in the bowels of the earth that will have practically little, if any, value.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. I will say to the gentleman that eight years ago this winter we had some of the experts before the Appropriations Committee and they then gave it as their expert opinion that within 10 years from that time the oil fields of this country would be entirely exhausted.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. And to-day there are 600,000,000 barrels stored on top of the ground in the State of Oklahoma alone.

Mr. CRAIL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CRAIL. I want to say that the price of low-gravity crude oil in southern California has been reduced to 45 cents per barrel in some fields, and in other fields lower than that, below the cost of production; and it seems to me that instead of trying to interfere with the oil industry there ought to be a tariff duty levied on low-gravity crude oil.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will support a tariff on all grades. In answer to the gentleman, let me say this: That within the last few days, in the Mid-Continent oil field, they have reduced the price of oil from 20 to 35 cents a barrel, but the consumers have not felt that reduction in the price of the gasoline or lubricating oils they use.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield to me for the purpose of asking the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the California oil producers are in favor of a tariff on oil?

Mr. CRAIL. I will say that I have had considerable correspondence and some telegrams in regard to that, with the information that there are 250,000 barrels of crude oil per day being shipped into the United States from South America, which is making it necessary for the independent producers to sell low-gravity crude oil at a price less than the cost of production.

Mr. BARBOUR. That is, this correspondence and these telegrams have come from the producers of oil?

Mr. CRAIL. Yes. The oil producer, as distinguished from the refiner, has had hard times the last two years, largely as a result of the importation, free of duty, of large quantities of crude oil from foreign countries.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I would like to suggest that I have had complaints to the effect that certain companies, with the privilege of the free importation of oil, feed in just enough oil to keep the crude price down to a low point, and at the same time maintain the refined price, ostensibly, or at least these people think, for the purpose of getting the control out of the hands of the local people into the hands of certain concerns.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I am going to cover that shortly.

Mr. JONES. I have had numerous complaints to that effect, that they feed in just enough oil to keep the price down to where the local people can not afford to produce it or own it and thus lose control of it, and these certain companies have such control that the price of the crude oil makes little difference to them, because they sell it in the refined form at the full price.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that both the independents and others joined to cut down the production in Oklahoma nearly 300,000 barrels per day within the last year, and the other fellows brought it up the coast.

Mr. JONES. And when they try to put on a conservation program they simply feed in still more and keep the price of the crude down just the same.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That has been the result, and nothing but a tariff will remedy it.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me so.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. We have heard a lot about the producers' views on a proposed tariff; can the gentleman give any information as to what would be reflected with respect to the consumers?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I will say to the gentleman that I am going to touch on this shortly, but I will say now that if you can name me a natural resource or a manufactured article where the tariff does not have some effect in raising the price, then I will answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. That Congress may have a fuller conception of the situation, I desire here to read to you a letter, which is based on sound logic and facts, that I received a few days ago.

AMARILLO, TEX., January 12, 1929.

Congressman E. B. HOWARD,

Tulsa District of Oklahoma, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is my understanding that you are preparing a bill providing for a tariff on oil and that you now have this bill or will have this bill before the present session of Congress.

Notice that you are working on this matter should be interesting to independent oil producers, royalty companies, landowners, and even States throughout the entire oil-producing districts of the United States.

A disastrous condition has occurred and been maintained for the past two years, which has adversely affected every investment in or contingent to the oil-producing business, save and except those investments which are so organized that they represent a vertical line of business, having production, transportation, refining, and marketing. The last-mentioned interests have benefited largely and comprise large corporations only, and actually represent but a small fraction of the commonwealth of this country, and should not be permitted to maintain a condition and special interest which operates adversely and disastrously to the vested rights and the welfare not only of individuals but of counties, towns, cities, and even States.

An examination of producing-oil areas and geographic surveys of the Nation shows that there are millions of acres of proven, semiproven, and potential oil lands. This land is the vested property of individuals, States, or of the Nation. The act of proving this land to contain great mineral wealth immediately enhances the value of such lands far above that for which it could be valued for any other purpose. The finding of oil in any community or State represents an increase in local and national wealth; that is, providing such increase in wealth accrues to those to whom it rightfully belongs.

It is a common fallacy for the public at large to think and believe that the discovery and production of oil confers benefits only upon that particular landowner and that particular oil company which is so fortunate as to enjoy the direct benefits of such discovery. However, a most casual investigation will show that this is not correct.

Railroads haul immense tonnage to such oil fields and generally invest much capital in extensions, switch tracks, terminal facilities, etc.

Supply houses, material men, lumbermen, and countless lines of manufacturers are at once interested, investing capital in warehouses, labor organizations, and untold millions of dollars of storage supplies.

Adjacent towns and even cities are at once made famous by the fact that new sources of national wealth are found at their doorsteps, and generally reflect an immediate expansion and growth in the way of new industries, new office buildings, jobbing houses, and untold millions in investments in real estate, home building, and countless other lines affecting the welfare of that entire community. Because of this added population and contingent lines of business, cities expand and grow and counties undertake bond issues for paving highways.

The State in which this community is located immediately becomes the beneficiary of increased taxes, and even the income-tax men of the Federal Government at Washington find this new community of sufficient interest to send special agents to check the income of the Government, which is a beneficiary from income taxes in these new and flourishing districts.

When it is considered that not only thousands of small towns, hundreds of thousands of individuals, and the welfare of countless counties of various States throughout the Union are affected by the possibility of production and the oil industry, but also that great cities, such as Los Angeles, Austin, Dallas, Shreveport, Beaumont, Fort Worth, Amarillo, Tulsa, Oklahoma City, and numberless other large cities throughout Indiana, Pennsylvania, Louisiana, Wyoming, Montana, Colorado, and other States, can suffer and do suffer tremendous losses in wealth, population, and shrinkage in business due to the violent fluctuations in the revenue received from the production of oil without any local power or machinery to prevent these disasters, then it is time for the people or their constituted authority to investigate the conditions that permit such a situation to exist and reoccur from time to time.

The marketing of the products of petroleum oil is a well-organized and profitable business, the bulk of the business being conducted by about 200 powerful corporations throughout the entire United States.

The refining of these oil products is a highly technical and well-organized business, also largely under the control of these same corporations.

The transportation of oil is also a well-organized business, allied with and largely under the control of the above-named corporations.

It will be noted that the sales price of petroleum products which the public at large obtains is well regulated and suffers no violent fluctuations that would cause disastrous losses and disorganization to either the transportation, refining, or marketing companies in the petroleum industry.

It is only in the production department of the industry which has the most to do with the welfare of the greatest number of individuals, small corporations, allied industries heretofore mentioned, and the taxable value of cities, counties, and States that boom conditions are enjoyed or disaster suffered, which wipes out the investments of literally hundreds of thousands of people, either in the oil-producing business or in allied lines of industries and community activities.

This situation is brought about by the violent fluctuations in the price of crude oil, which is arbitrarily set from time to time by those corporations which are primarily interested in the transportation, refining, and marketing of crude oil and its products.

The law of supply and demand governs the actions of this last-named group. When the production of crude oil shows to be in excess of current refinery demands and at the same time new crude-oil discoveries are encountered, the posted field price for crude oil is ruthlessly put down, thereby paralyzing smaller producing companies in all allied lines of industry and depreciating property values through the entire district, adjoining cities, States, and the Nation.

This disastrous shrinkage may occur overnight upon the discovery of one or two new potential oil fields which show promise of furnishing sufficient additional oil to warrant safety in such procedure to the transporters, refiners, and marketers of crude oil.

Although this new strike may be in a far-western State, yet every field throughout the Nation and every community in which such fields exist immediately suffer by this general marking down in the price of crude oil.

There appears to be no proportional relation whatever between the price which the public at large pays for refined products and the price which producers and marketers receive for the production of crude oil.

When the posted price of crude oil was $3.60 a barrel throughout the midcontinent field the public paid from 20 to 30 cents per gallon for gasoline and 20 to 40 cents per quart for lubricating oils.

With the posted field price at an average of 80 cents per barrel in the Panhandle oil fields, the price of refined products still hovers around 20 cents per gallon for gasoline and a good fair price for lubricating oils.

It then can not be stated that a fair profit to independent oil producers, which affects the welfare and taxable values of landowners and property owners in adjoining cities and communities, is the yardstick by which the petroleum industry is operated and that the public at large in buying the refined products are gainers through the fact that the producers are suffering such losses.

There are too many intermediate stations between the production and valuation of crude oil and the ultimate purchase of its products for such condition to exist.

The oil industry and its allied lines of business is to-day the biggest industrial business in the United States. Its ramifications affect more people than any other line of business. As such, it is the only line of business that has been marshaled, organized, and controlled by a relatively few closely allied corporations without any endeavor on the part of the commonwealth to intelligently comprehend and better regulate this industry.

Great credit should be given to those corporations who have developed this tremendous industry, and in writing you this letter it is not to be construed as a disparagement or attack upon any of them in the conduct of their business.

It is most likely that this condition would exist in any other line of business which affected the public largely if no protective tariff were obtained to safeguard the vested interests of this country.

If it were possible for a great merchandising corporation, such as Montgomery Ward or others, to obtain an unlimited supply of cheaply manufactured articles from Europe and import same to this country and distribute into a vast organization of retail stores owned and controlled by it, you would immediately note the same depression in business in countless towns and cities, due to the fact that tens of thousands of small merchants would be forced to close their doors, thousands of allied lines of industry would close down, and untold millions of dollars of wealth would be wiped out solely to the benefit of this one big merchandising corporation.

In the universal interest of landowners, tens of thousands of small independent oil producers, communities, counties, cities, and States, some sensible and flexible tariff should be considered and adopted which will protect and safeguard the vested rights and interests of all those directly connected with or whose business depends upon the production of crude oil throughout this Nation.

Trusting that you will give this matter the serious thought and earnest work which it deserves, and believing that the very act of making a comprehensive effort to stabilize this industry will meet the approval not only of the people to be benefited but also the sympathetic cooperation of transporters, refiners, and marketers of crude oil and its products, I remain,

Very truly yours,

JOHNSON RANCH ROYALTY CO. (INC.),
By ED. R. MAYER, President.

Mr. Chairman, there is no greater field for securing sound and valuable information than the newspapers of this country, especially is this true of any discussion of a subject in their editorial columns. Naturally a newspaper published at the center of oil production in America would have given thorough and scientific study to the question of a tariff on oil before commenting on it editorially. Tulsa is the center of the oil-producing industry of America. Newspapers published in that city naturally give mature and sober thought to the good of the industry and all its branches. They naturally, also, give due consideration to the interests of the consumers, for they realize that any injury to him, any undue advantage of him, would be detrimental to the producer's market and to the industry as a whole. Here I desire to read to you an editorial published in the Tulsa Tribune, commenting on the bill which I have introduced, and may I say to you before reading it that the Tribune is a well-edited, conservative, and fearless publication that gives thought to subjects of this kind before expressing an opinion. The editorial says:

FOR THE OIL TARIFF

Congressman E. B. HOWARD'S bill, proposing a tariff on petroleum imports, although deplored in the keynote speech made to the Chicago convention of the American Petroleum Institute by Axtell J. Byles, of the Tide Water Oil Co., may yet command the undivided support of independent oil producers of the United States and of the public. Mr. Byles, failing to enumerate his reasons for opposing the tariff, pointed out the only possible alternative when he urged adoption of a world-wide plan for cooperation in the production of oil.

A condition inimical to the security of the independent oil producer whose production is confined to domestic fields has already developed in increased importations of Latin-American oil. British and American operators of prolific leases in Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, and other Latin-American countries are able to deliver petroleum products to the markets of the United States at prices that threaten the profits of the domestic producer.

Leases secured by the concessions route, cheap labor, low water freight rates, and lower foreign taxes all combine to reduce the costs of production of Latin-American oil and of its delivery to American ports. The producer who pays the Oklahoma, Kansas, Texas, Louisiana, or Arkansas landowner a high price for a lease, who pays his employees the American wage scale, whose holdings are subject to taxation by city, State, and Federal Governments, and who uses his wealth toward the industrial and social development of his community and Nation can not meet the competition of the importers.

The tariff as proposed by Congressman HOWARD is at present not only necessary to the continued prosperity of the American oil industry, but the interests of all the people of the oil-producing States are also involved. It is largely due to the independent oil producer that the oil industry has become an integral part of the economic life of the oil-producing States. It is Bill Skelly, Waite Phillips, and others of the type who have used the profits of production of oil in Tulsa territory to build Tulsa. Similarly in every other oil-producing section of the United States.

One objection that may be raised to Congressman HOWARD'S bill by Congressmen from other States is that it might increase the costs of petroleum products to the American consumer. But if the independent producers should be forced out of the industry by the trust importing foreign oil, the dangers to the interests of the consumer would be infinitely greater than any that lie in the proposed tariff. The independent producer, developing American leases as rapidly as the oil could be absorbed by the growing army of gas engines, has kept prices down to a fair level and thus has aided the growth of the automobile industry and served the whole American public. As long as he holds the upper hand in the oil industry, the interests of the motoring public will be safe. It would be well for representatives of automobile manufacturers and motorists, who will consider the Howard bill, to keep this in mind.

The Howard bill is thoroughly in accord with the policy of protection. If New England factories turning out products used by the whole American public are protected by the tariff, the oil industry, which benefits a greater area than these factories, obviously is entitled to the same protection. No section of the country, nor any other industry, should begrudge it.

Should the independent producer be given a pledge by the importers that importations of Latin-American crude will be cooperatively curbed to remove every element of unfair competition, they might be willing to pass up the protection of the tariff. Mr. Byles has suggested this, and there is a possibility that his suggestion may be heeded by the producers who have seen the effectiveness of the Oklahoma proration agreement, which he so highly praised. But before declining to enter the fight for the tariff, every independent producer should be convinced that his interests will be safe without it.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with the editorial just read I want to call your special attention to the following paragraph, which answers one question that naturally arises in the minds of everyone considering a tariff on any commodity and also answers the question of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. That paragraph reads:

One objection that may be raised to Congressman HOWARD'S bill by Congressmen from other States is that it might increase the costs of petroleum products to the American consumer. But if the independent producers should be forced out of the industry by the trusts importing foreign oil, the dangers to the interests of the consumer would be infinitely greater than any that lie in the proposed tariff. The independent producer, developing American leases as rapidly as the oil could be absorbed by the growing army of gas engines, has kept prices down to a fair level and thus has aided the growth of the automobile industry and served the whole American public. As long as he holds the upper hand in the oil industry, the interests of the motoring public will be safe. It would be well for representatives of automobile manufacturers and motorists, who will consider the Howard bill, to keep this in mind.

The Howard bill is thoroughly in accord with the policy of protection. If New England factories turning out products used by the whole American public are protected by the tariff, the oil industry, which benefits a greater area than these factories, obviously is entitled to the same protection. No section of the country, nor any other industry, should begrudge it.

The above quotations are but a few of the many that I could give you in justification of this tariff, but under the circumstances I see no necessity for lengthy argument. The next Congress and the next administration will be entirely under the control of the Republican Party, which is pledged to a protective tariff in all its platforms, which have contained the following language:

We reaffirm our belief in the protective tariff to extend needed protection to our productive industries.

Then the leaders of the Republican Party are pledged to a protective tariff for American industry. Recently, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], Republican House leader, a man in whom I have the greatest confidence, and I have never seen a man that I considered more sincere or reliable in any statement he makes, made this statement throughout the country:

The principles and benefits of a protective tariff must be extended to all American industries.

And then, further than that, in a speech at Tulsa, the oil capital of the world, on Thursday, September 27, 1928, Senator CURTIS, then candidate and now Vice President elect, said:

In the last two revenue bills I proposed a duty on oil. You, in Oklahoma, I see, have requested the limitation of oil production. I took a market report and found that last year we imported 77,000,000 barrels of oil into this country. I suggest that we shut out those 77,000,000 barrels and you would not have to shut down production here.

This means a promise from the Vice President elect that he will give the oil industry a tariff. I plead with him, although I should not need to, because certainly Senator CURTIS will keep his promise, and with his great power he should be able to deliver a tariff to the oil producers of the country and they are expecting it. [Applause.]

Not only this, Mr. Chairman, but I call the attention of the Democrats to the fact that in their platform written at Houston, Tex., they said that they favored—a tariff for any industry that would make up the actual difference between cost of production at home and abroad, with adequate safeguards for the wage of the American laborer.

Now, I want to say that when I am home this summer as a private citizen and you are perspiring over this tariff bill, I can not but expect that the Republican Party, through the leaders of the party, including Senator CURTIS, and the Democrats, standing on their platform made at Houston, will place an equitable tariff on crude oil and its products, and give the American independent producer, the American laborer, and the American farmer on whose land this oil is produced the protection that you will give to other people in the coming tariff bill. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Yes; if I have any time.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has presented a very forceful argument in favor of a protective tariff policy, and I agree with the gentleman entirely and I am in favor of putting a tariff on crude oil. I want to say that the gentleman's remarks are very interesting, coming from a Democrat and one of the leading Democrats of Oklahoma, and coming from Oklahoma. I am wondering if my friend from Oklahoma believes in the application of that same policy or that same principle of protection to other things produced in this country.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for asking me that question, because as a Member of this Congress I have voted for every tariff presented, calling the gentleman's attention to the fact that after the war, when we had found we had begun to manufacture in this country articles that we had not manufactured previous to the war, and you presented bills here to that effect, I supported those bills. Of course, the gentleman knows that I was not a Member of Congress when the Fordney-McCumber bill was passed. I supported an emergency tariff on agriculture and have, and always will, support every tariff bill that equalizes the opportunities of American capital with that of foreign nations and protects American labor from the ill effects of cheap foreign labor. [Applause.]

Mr. DENISON. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, on January 11, 1929, I presented to the House a report on fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia which has been printed as House Document No. 506.

January 29, 1929, the Evening Star carried the following statement made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations for the District of Columbia.

Without reading the whole article I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman is this going to create any controversy with reference to the attitude of the United States Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. I take it not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think we are going pretty far in our debates recently in criticizing acts and activities of Members of the other body. That is against the rules.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not violating the rule. The matter referred to is not a discussion on the floor of the other body. This is a press report carried in outside publications and has no reference to anything that took place in the other body.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Does the article serve as a text for the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is the reason I ask that it be printed as a part of my remarks.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is going to proceed to discuss that statement?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

A study of this report leads to a feeling of satisfaction that there has been prepared such a detailed independent study of the taxation and fiscal affairs of all cities in the United States having an estimated population of between 300,000 and 1,000,000.

It is obvious that the city of Washington, with a population of something more than half a million, has very similar problems and that in attempting to judge the nature of the fiscal relations between the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia such figures are of help.

As has been pointed out by Representative SIMMONS, the chairman of the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations in charge of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, some matters have been left out which should have been given consideration. I understand that in accordance with his suggestions a supplementary report is in progress of preparation and I shall read it with interest when it appears.

INCLINED TO AGREE WITH BUREAU

I am inclined to agree with the Bureau of Efficiency that the solution of the problem of fiscal relations lies in determining the Federal Government's liability toward the cost of running the District of Columbia along the lines of the tax liability of the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer in connection with the ordinary costs of government and also its liability on account of extraordinary expenditures occasioned by the fact that Washington is the National Capital and that the District is not at liberty to tax Government property.

Four interesting questions rise: (1) What is the liability of the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer? (2) What is the loss of tax revenue to the Government of the District of Columbia on account of excessive exemptions of real property? (3) How much of the cost of excess park acquisition and maintenance should be met by the Federal Government? (4) How much of the liability of the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer should be offset by reason of the very considerable economic benefits accruing to the District owing to the presence here of national monuments and great public buildings which make Washington the mecca of hundreds of thousands of tourists?

HOLDS $7,440,939 FAIR CHARGE

According to the report a fair charge on the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer would be $7,440,939. As a matter of fact, the Federal Government makes a contribution of $9,000,000, which leaves a balance of $1,550,061 to be applied to the items of excess park acquisition and maintenance and recovery of revenue lost on account of excessive exemptions of real property from taxation.

It appears to me that there might properly be added to that balance the $451,857 with which the report charges the Federal Government as a tax on intangible personal property. I have grave doubts as to the justification for such a liability on the part of the Federal Government. If this were added to the balance, it would give us $2,011,000 to be applied to the excess items.

A study of the tables would seem to show that a fair charge in connection with the parks would be about $1,100,000, leaving about $900,000 to apply to the loss of revenue due to excessive exemption.

A careful study of the schedules of exempt property valuations shows that the ratio of exempt to taxable real property is three times as high for Washington as for other cities. At first sight it would appear that this would justify a very great increase in Federal aid to the District. However, when there is deducted from the exempt property United States property on which it may be assumed we are now paying taxes under cover of the $9,000,000 appropriation, there still remains a total of $283,991,600 of exempt property apart from that owned and used by the Federal Government. This item is made up of exemptions for educational and scientific institutions, religious purposes, hospitals, charitable and benevolent institutions, embassies and legations, and a very considerable amount of public property used for parks and for the benefit of the city of Washington. A study of the tables shows that this is larger than that of any other city in the country of comparable size except the city of Boston, where there is an unusual amount of United States and Massachusetts State property.

A fair average amount of exempt taxable property for a city of this size is about $180,000,000. By reason of this being the Capital of the Nation there is located here an unusual number of nontaxable institutions and an unusual amount of nontaxable public property, bringing the total to more than $100,000,000 in excess of that amount. It seems to me fair that the United States should pay toward the expenses of the District of Columbia an amount of money equivalent to normal taxes on that $100,000,000 of real property that is in excess of ordinary average exemptions for a city of this size. That means something over $1,700,000. Of that amount it is fair to say that the Federal Government is at the present time paying $900,000, or the balance of the lump-sum contribution, in my opinion.

A study of the report offers the further thought that the District taxpayers are not being taxed more heavily than other cities of this size.

Finally, the showing regarding the extraordinary amount of park area provided here by reason of this being the Nation's Capital and which makes our park area nearly twice as much as most cities of this approximate size, would justify the Federal Government bearing the amount equivalent to the difference between the cost of parks in average cities of this size and that of the Nation's Capital, or, say, $1,100,000.

In conclusion, it would seem to me fair that the United States should contribute something over $800,000 more as its share of running the government of the District and I would suggest that the bill be amended by adding $800,000 to the $9,000,000 lump sum now included in the bill.

My study of the report leads me to believe that the Federal Government ought to make an effort to pay taxes on its tangible property in the District of Columbia and the lump sum contributed by the Federal Government to the District revenues ought, I believe, to vary as the value of the property of the Government varies.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator in the statement asks four questions and answers three of them. The question unanswered is No. 4 of the above, which I quote:

How much of the liability of the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer should be offset by reason of the very considerable economic benefits accruing to the District owing to the presence here of national monuments and great public buildings which make Washington the Mecca of hundreds of thousands of tourists?

The Senator does not answer the question and does not attempt to give the United States any credit for the "offset." I feel that the "offset" suggested is too restricted in its scope. In my statement on fiscal relations in the House last week, Wednesday, January the 23d, I suggest the scope of the "offset" and several easily determinable amounts. Repetition here is not necessary Senator BINGHAM answers the first question: "What is the liability of the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer?" by reaching the sum of $6,989,082 as the proper amount and rejects the Bureau of Efficiency figure of $7,440,939. The Senator shares the same "grave doubt" that I expressed as to the justification of a charge against the United States as an intangible tax and he therefore deducts, properly, I think, from the $7,440,939 which the Bureau of Efficiency reached, leaving a total of $6,989,082 as the normal "tax" bill of the United States to the District of Columbia. The Senator, however, accepts without question the "tax" on tangible personalty of $1,536,315—in spite of the fact that that charges the United States for the fiscal year 1928 with 51 per cent of the taxable tangible personal property of the District. I submit, as I did in my previous statement, that that is an absurd charge against the United States. Either it is too high as a "charge" against the United States, or it means that the District citizen is not paying his full share of District tangible taxes. In either event the charge is unfair to the United States on a comparative basis. But let us accept the Senator's figures of $6,989,082 as a proper "tax"—leaving $2,010,918, which the $9,000,000 lump-sum payment gives to the district over and above a normal "tax." The Bureau of Efficiency in its report on fiscal relations, page 5, arrives at a tax "payable by the United States to the District of Columbia of $7,440,939," divided as follows:

Real property tax	$5,452,767
Tangible personalty	1,536,315
Intangible personalty	451,857
Total	7,440,939

The Senator then asks question No. 2:

What is the loss of tax revenue to the government of the District of Columbia on account of excessive exemptions of real property?

This question is answered in table No. 5 of the report, page 11. The table shows that Washington has exempt from taxation $283,991,600. The Senator says that this is excessive in comparison with other cities, and says that $180,000,000 is a fair average amount for a "city of this size." Presumably he has selected Buffalo as the model city, for Buffalo has as its ratio of exempt to taxable property 17.33 per cent as against 17.35 per cent as the average of all cities shown in the table except Washington. The Senator, therefore, assumes that Buffalo's exempt property and Washington's ought to be equal and proposes to charge to the United States $100,000,000 of "excess exemptions." The error in the Senator's calculations arises from the fact that he does not include the whole equation. Buffalo has assessed real estate of $1,031,770,390. Washington has assessed real estate of $1,438,844,177 (this figure includes $320,751,015 of United States real property, on which the Bureau of Efficiency figures a real tax of $5,452,767).

The ratio of exempt to taxable real property in Buffalo is 17.33 per cent. The ratio of exempt to taxable real property in Washington is 19.74 per cent.

Table No. 2 shows that Buffalo has an assessed value per capita of $1,865.77, while Washington's assessed value per capita is $2,740.66. The Detroit bureau of governmental research table inserted in the hearings on the District of Columbia bill, page 572, shows that Buffalo is assessed on an estimated basis of 78 per cent of actual value, while Washington is assessed on an estimated basis of 90 per cent actual value. The Bureau of the Census figures that Buffalo real property is assessed at 75 per cent of its real value, while Washington is assessed at 100 per cent. (See table, p. 1076, hearings on District of Columbia bill, fiscal year 1929.) It is perfectly obvious that Buffalo has lower percentage of value as the basis of the assessment of real property and that this lower percentage is reflected both in the amount of real property exempt and real property taxed. The true comparison between Buffalo and Washington is not the isolated table of exemptions alone but by a comparison of exemptions to real property taxed in both cities. On that basis Washington has 19.74 per cent exempt, while Buffalo has 17.33 per cent exempt. The average exempt ratio is 17.35 per cent, thus making Washington 2.39 per cent above the average in real property exemptions. Washington is 2.41 per cent above Buffalo in exemptions. For facility in figuring let us accept 2.4 per cent as the proper figure; $1,438,844,177 is the total assessed taxable real property; 2.4 per cent of that is $34,532,260; add, then, $35,000,000 to the assessed "taxable" property charged to the United States, and Washington will then be reduced to the average of the cities studied in exemptions. A tax of $1.70 a hundred on $35,000,000 gives $595,000. That, in my opinion, is the maximum of possible losses by virtue of "excessive exemptions" of real property in answer to question No. 2.

It will be interesting to analyze the Senator's $180,000,000 figure as the measure of exempt property.

The Bureau of Efficiency report, after deducting the $320,750,000 of United States property on which taxes are assumed as paid under the $9,000,000, still leaves $283,991,600 of property as exempt from taxation. This latter sum is made up as follows:

Educational and scientific purposes		$35,000,000
Religious purposes		25,000,000
Cemeteries		2,000,000
Hospital, charitable, and benevolent institutions		13,000,000
All other, including embassies and legations		5,000,000
Total, private property exempt		80,000,000
Other exempt public property:
United States property dedicated to use of the District	$31,915,412
District of Columbia park property (small areas, playgrounds, etc.)	3,035,971
District of Columbia owned property (municipal)	50,000,000
United States park property	119,040,217
		203,991,600
Grand total, exempt property		283,991,600

The foregoing statement shows a total of exempt property of $283,991,600, of which $80,000,000 is private property. The remainder is public property, either owned by the United States or by the District.

If, as the Senator proposes, the total exemptions are reduced from $283,991,600 to $180,000,000, or in the sum of $103,991,600, it is logical to find out just what that $180,000,000 would then consist of, or upon what property the United States would be asked to pay taxes by reducing the total amount of exempts by $103,991,600, upon which, at the rate of $1.70, the United States would be asked to assume $1,767,857.20 in taxes.

In arriving at the matter from either direction certain property must inevitably be included in the exempt list. There can be no question about leaving in the present exemptions the following property, which is either wholly municipally owned or which is United States owned and dedicated to District uses without any rent charge from the United States, namely:

United States property dedicated to District use	$31,915,412
District of Columbia owned park property	3,035,971
District of Columbia owned property (municipal)	50,000,000
Total	84,951,383

Deducting this sum of $84,951,383 from the Senator's $180,000,000 still leaves $95,048,617 for exempts under his calculation. What would that consist of? Shall it include all of the $80,000,000 of privately owned exempt property and thus leave the United States to pay taxes on $104,991,600, or 87 per cent, of the $119,040,217 of the federally owned park property which is a municipal benefit and usable by the people of the District as freely as their city-owned park property? Or shall the United States pay taxes on some part of the privately owned exempt property and taxes on a smaller percentage than 87 per cent of the federally owned park property? Whichever way you take the suggested $180,000,000 figure of exemptions the result will either require the United States to pay taxes on some of the privately owned exempt property or on a larger percentage than it should be called upon to pay for exemption of parks which it owns and which it makes available to all intents and purposes as municipal parks. On the other hand, by using the Bureau of Efficiency report and arriving at the average of exemptions for other comparable cities, I have shown that a fair reduction in the $283,991,600 of exempt property would be $35,000,000, bringing the figure down to $249,000,000 instead of the $284,000,000.

That figure of $35,000,000 should be applied, not on the $84,951,383 of District-owned property and United States property dedicated to District purposes, not on the $80,000,000 of privately owned property, but to the $119,040,217 of Federally owned park property. By doing this the United States would assume taxes on approximately 30 per cent of the parks which it owns and which have made it unnecessary for the municipality to go in as deeply for park acquisitions as some other cities have been compelled to do, and largely by bond issues. The taxes on this 30 per cent would, as I have heretofore pointed out, amount to $595,000.

This $35,000,000 is the only fair reduction in the $284,000,000 of exempt property that should be made, based upon the equitable average figures of the Bureau of Efficiency report. The $35,000,000, however, is $68,991,600 less than the $103,991,600 by which the Senator would reduce the total exemptions. I respectfully suggest that this difference of $68,991,600 of exemptions—which, at $1.70, would carry taxes of $1,172,857.20—is the answer to the fourth question which he asked, but did not answer, namely:

How much of the liability of the Federal Government as a municipal taxpayer should be offset by reason of the very considerable economic benefits accruing to the District, owing to the presence here of national monuments and great public buildings which make Washington the Mecca of hundreds of thousands of tourists?

The Senator suggests a reduction in the total exemptions of $103,991,600 which, applying the $1.70 tax rate, would charge the United States with $1,767,857.20. I suggest following the Bureau of Efficiency report figures and reduce the exemptions by $35,000,000, which, applying the $1.70 tax rate, would charge the United States with taxes of $595,000. The difference between the two sets of figures is $68,991,600 of exemptions and $1,172,857.20 in taxes to the United States. I know of no better place for him to find the answer to his fourth question.

I am pleased at the Senator's finding that the District taxpayer is not being taxed more heavily than other cities of this size. The tables of the report show that they are taxed under cities of their size.

Then the Senator asks this question:

How much of the cost of excess-park acquisition and maintenance should be met by the Federal Government?

He states that the Federal Government should bear—the amount equivalent to the difference between the cost of parks in average cities of this size and that of the Nation's Capital, or, say $1,100,000.

How he arrives at that figure is not disclosed. Table No. 1, page 7, shows that Washington has 1 acre of parks to every 140 people, while the average is 1 acre to 253 people.

Table No. 13, page 76, answers the Senator's question. It shows that Washington has a per capita cost of $2.38 for "recreation" as against an average of $1.65 for the comparable cities, or 73 cents per capita above the average. This is the item in which the parks are carried. Five hundred and fifty thousand persons, at 73 cents each, equals $401,500 that this excess costs above the average.

We have, then, from the Bureau of Efficiency report the following answer to the Senator's question:

Ordinary tax load	$6,989,082
Loss by excessive exemptions	595,000
Excess park maintenance	401,500
Total	7,985,582

This leaves, by the $9,000,000 payment by the Federal Government, $1,014,418 over and above all items which the Senator included in his statement, with the exception of park purchases, which is a variable sum, from year to year. No figures are available as to who paid the cost of park lands already acquired. The bill this year carries $1,000,000 for park purchases. Upon the basis of these figures the United States is not only paying a fair tax on its property, the excess cost of exemptions, and excess park maintenance above the average, but over and above that is paying $1,000,000 for parks in the city. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16714, the naval appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 16301) making appropriations for the independent establishments of the Government for the fiscal year 1930, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is agreeable to the minority?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 16301, the independent offices appropriation bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. WASON, Mr. SUMMERS of Washington, Mr. ALLEN, Mr. CULLEN, and Mr. VINSON of Kentucky.

THE HARRIS AMENDMENT

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in view of certain references made to the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia in the discussion in the House yesterday on House Resolution 303, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein three short editorials appearing in as many newspapers of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what are the editorials about?

Mr. COX. They are in refutation of an inference made in the discussion of yesterday to the effect that the Senator was actuated by political motives in offering his prohibition amendment calling for added appropriations for the enforcement of the prohibition law.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the editorials maintain that he was not?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. I shall not object, but I would observe this, since I was one of those who mentioned the name of the Senator from Georgia yesterday, I did not, and I do not think that any one ascribed motives, political or otherwise, to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about that; and I can show him the RECORD.

Mr. CRAMTON. I do not yield. I did ascribe political motives to the Democratic Party in this House in their movement conducted with reference to that question, and I doubt if the newspapers of Georgia have any better evidence upon that than we have here; but I do not object. I have a very high regard for the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this relates to a matter that was discussed here yesterday, I think it is proper that these editorials should go in the RECORD, and therefore hope that no one will object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that the new wet leader in the House does not object, I shall not object.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do I understand that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] says that he attributed political motives to the Democratic Party? An astounding presumption!

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the three short editorials published in Georgia newspapers, which are as follows:

[From the Albany Daily Herald, January 29, 1929]

SENATOR HARRIS

The several gentlemen who are reported to be grooming themselves for Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS'S office might do well to put their ears to the ground before spending time and money in an effort to return him to private life. We have no quarrel with those who aspire to high office, but the man who imagines he can beat Senator HARRIS in 1930 is so lacking in judgment that he prejudices his own case. He tempts us to conclude that he is lacking in the qualifications with which a Senator should be endowed.

If opposition to the Senator is to be an echo of 1928, and if his opponent is to base his claim on the vote cast in Georgia last November, a study of the returns will give no comfort to the anti-Harrisites. Senator HARRIS will be reelected in 1930, no matter what the issue or who the challenger.

[From the Adel News]

SENATORS HARRIS AND GEORGE

With no reference whatever to the last national campaign, but solely from the viewpoint of ability and conscientious service to their State and the Nation as well, this paper here and now goes on record as standing squarely with Senators HARRIS and GEORGE should they have opposition for their seats in the United States Senate in the next election, which is some time off now. It would be a sad day for Georgia should she swap them for some of the politicians who have been suggested as their successors. It would be worse than a calamity to the State and to the country.

[From the Atlanta Constitution, January 31, 1929]

THE HARRIS AMENDMENT

A story printed in the Washington Post of Sunday represents Senator HARRIS as offering his now famous $24,000,000 amendment to the deficiency bill for increased prohibition enforcement as a clever move "to mend his political fences in Georgia." The story relates that by the Senator's campaign support of Governor Smith he so alienated the dry anti-Smith Democrats of this State as to put in jeopardy his reelection to the Senate next year, but it says his authorship of this amendment "assures that reelection."

No man in high official life in Georgia for half a century has had a closer hold on his constituents than Senator HARRIS.

In the campaign of last year Senator HARRIS knew perfectly well the character and extent of the Georgia opposition to Governor Smith, and had he been a timid politician with loose principles and chameleon convictions, he easily might have paltered with the situation. Instead he accepted loyally the actions of his party and, like the courageous man that he is, he gave to the party and to its candidates his faithful support. And the State would have been amazed to witness him doing anything less than that.

There was not a moment during the late campaign, nor has there been one since, when the reelection of Senator HARRIS was dubitable. It needed no reenforcement by this $24,000,000 prohibition appropriation or any other. No one in Georgia ever doubted the Senator's conscientious devotion to the prohibition cause and all understand that the appropriation he champions is a sincere nonpolitical and non-electioneering endeavor to promote the better enforcement of the prohibition law.

He was plenarily fortified in declaring to the Senate that prohibition enforcement, so-called, is an all too palpable "farce," and he is fully justified in putting up to the authorities—the Congress and the administration—whether they are set to continue the great farce or accept some helpful part of the enormous fund they admit will be demanded to secure any very obvious betterment of present conditions.

At least Senator HARRIS has brought the crucial issue face to face with those whose duty it is to make prohibition effective, if that is at all possible. They must now agree with him, accept the proffered aid, or throw up their hands in admitted despair.

As for his support of Governor Smith's candidacy after nomination, that added to the popular esteem for Senator HARRIS instead of derogating from it. He thereby enhanced his reputation as a 100 per cent Democrat who was and is loyal enough to subordinate a personal desire to the demands of the great party of which he is so distinguished and useful a leader.

PRINTED HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. BEERS. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Printing, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 48

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 2,500 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee entitled "Tariff Readjustment, 1929" during the current session.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 6, after the word "the" where it appears for the first time, insert the word "consolidated," and, in line 7, after the word "committee," insert the words "relative to."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEERS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman inform us, or if not, can the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means inform us, whether the hearings are being printed daily?

Mr. HAWLEY. The daily hearings are being printed daily.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And are they right up with the work there?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. The hearings of one day will be in printed form the second morning after that day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, some Members have spoken to me about getting copies of these hearings. There seems to be a misunderstanding on the part of some Members about committee hearings. Some seem to think that they are obtainable at the document room and that they are distributed through that room. I think it well to have the statement go in the RECORD that no committee hearings, except by special order, are ever distributed through the document room or the folding room. They are distributed from the committee rooms themselves. I take it that any Member interested can by going to the Committee on Ways and Means obtain copies of these hearings.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. We have been sending them out and will continue to do so so long as the supply lasts. We are taking the full thousand that we are entitled to print. This resolution provides for printing the consolidated hearings, when they are corrected, and they will be available to everybody in the committee room.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is the usual resolution?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On two occasions I have asked for hearings on certain schedules and I been unable to obtain them.

Mr. HAWLEY. At first we thought that 600 copies would be sufficient, but an unprecedented number of witnesses has appeared and the 600 limit was raised to the full thousand.

The question was taken, and the committee amendments were agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

COMPILATION OF FACTS REGARDING AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. BEERS. Mr. Speaker, I have another privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 82

Resolved, That the compilation made by M. A. Musmanno from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the facts regarding all amendments of the Constitution of the United States proposed since 1889 be printed as a public document.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

SUITS AGAINST DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3581) to authorize the Commissioners of the District to settle claims against the District of Columbia.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3581) entitled "An act authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to settle claims and suits against the District of Columbia," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

Amendment numbered 1: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language inserted by the House insert the following:

"SEC. 2. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to grant relief in claims for refund of taxes paid, or for cancellation of assessments heretofore made and subsequent to September 1, 1916, in such cases where like assessments, or assessments against property of similar character, have been held to be void or erroneous by decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, or the Supreme Court of the United States: Provided, That any claims for refunds of taxes heretofore paid or for cancellations of assessments heretofore made shall be filed within one year from the approval of this act.

"Nothing contained in this act shall be construed as reducing the period of the statute of limitations."

And the House agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same.

FREDK. N. ZIHLMAN,
CHARLES L. UNDERHILL,
RALPH GILBERT,
Managers on the part of the House.

ARTHUR CAPPER,
JOHN J. BLAINE,
WILLIAM H. KING,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3581) entitled "An act authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to settle claims and suits against the District of Columbia," submit the following detailed statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and recommended in the conference report, namely:

On No. 1: By this amendment the House struck out the section of the Senate bill limiting proceedings to cancel tax assessments or recover taxes paid to one year from the date of the decision of a court of last resort holding void the tax law.

The House amendment limited the time for filing such claims to a period of one year from the approval of the act, but under such amendment the claims to be filed within the year might involve taxes or assessments over an unlimited period of years. On the other hand, the bill as passed by the Senate would allow no relief unless a court of last resort (presumably the Supreme Court of the United States) held the tax law or assessment void. This would not cover cases arising under the so-called Borland law or amendment since September 1, 1916, in which certain assessments for paving or repaving have been held erroneous by the District Supreme Court, the Court of Appeals, or the Supreme Court of the United States.

By the action of the conferees the Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House No. 1, and agrees to the same with an amendment limiting the claims to be filed within a year from the approval of the act to those involving taxes or assessments since September 1, 1916, the date of the Borland amendment or law. This puts a practical limitation on the claims to be handled by the commissioners, and is in accordance with the recommendation of the corporation counsel of the District of Columbia. Passage of the bill, so amended, will afford relief to those who have been unjustly taxed or assessed and discriminated against, as determined in other cases of like character by the courts.

On No. 2: The bill as reported to the Senate by its District of Columbia Committee limited settlements by the District Commissioners to $5,000 in amount. The Senate, in passing the bill, reduced the amount to $3,000. The House, by its amendment No. 2, restored the amount of authorized settlement to $5,000, which is in accordance with the bill as originally drafted by the District Commissioners and the corporation counsel, and also the general policy of Congress with respect to claims against the Government. By action of the conferees, the Senate recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the House No. 2, and agrees to the same.

FREDK. N. ZIHLMAN,
CHARLES L. UNDERHILL,
RALPH GILBERT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, which I have no desire to do, can the gentleman give any information as to the prospect of getting legislation completed in reference to condemnation proceedings in the District of Columbia?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that the House has already passed that legislation. The House committee appointed a subcommittee to follow that legislation in the Senate. The Senate have agreed to the bill with some slight amendments, which I understand are acceptable to the corporation counsel and attorney for the Department of Justice. My understanding is that the bill is on the Senate Calendar, amending the code providing for condemnation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. CRAMTON. There is some one following it up and making some effort to get it to us?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The District Committee of the House have had a subcommittee wait upon the Senators composing the District of Columbia Committee and have enlisted their cooperation in agreeing on a bill which I understand is now on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. CRAMTON. That applies to purchases for the District of Columbia and not for the Federal Government?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. This is for the Federal Government. In addition the Senate has reported a bill changing the method for the District of Columbia government. The bill passed by the House and amended by the Senate applies to purchases by the Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. Both of these bills are of great importance.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. And the committee has been following up the legislation in every possible way.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

JOHN W. STOCKETT

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 2319, to disagree to the Senate amendments, and that the conferees be appointed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 2319) for the relief of John W. Stockett.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman from Kansas give us some idea about this situation? It is my recollection of it that the Senate bill raised this allowance far beyond the agreement arrived at by the House. What is the fact?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Senate raised it to $142,500. The House reduced it and put on an amendment limiting the attorney's fee to 10 per cent.

Mr. CRAMTON. What is the provision as to the attorney's fee in the Senate bill?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Nothing.

Mr. CRAMTON. The House bill fixed $50,000 as the amount of the claim, and the Senate raised the amount to $142,500. There seems to be nothing to prevent the extra $100,000 going to the attorney. Is the gentleman from Kansas in a position to give any assurance to the House as to the attitude of the conferees?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The War Claims Committee by a unanimous vote requested the conferees that might be appointed from that committee to insist on the House amendment. If I am on the conference, I shall do that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it not a fact that after the passage of this bill by the House the person involved has made a statement to the effect that he was perfectly satisfied with the amount carried in the House bill?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I am advised by the clerk of the Senate committee that they have a signed statement from the claimant that he is willing to accept the House amendment.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the House should accept a provision to pay $142,500, with no limitation as to the attorney's fee, you might as well go out of the business of having a War Claims Committee or a Claims Committee and pass these bills as the Senate demands. But I am so well satisfied that the House conferees will not yield to that sort of legislation that I shall not object.

Mr. SNELL. Is this the bill concerning which common rumor says that as it passed the Senate it carries three times the amount the claimant would have been satisfied with?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I am not prepared to answer that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suppose all this is going into the RECORD. Referring to the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], I do not know anything about a private agreement; but from the record itself, the official record of the committee and of the Congress, there certainly is no indication that anywhere a bill was put through for more than the claimant thought he was entitled to; but, on the contrary, the claimant believes that he was entitled to three times as much as is contained in the bill, and measured by the amount paid upon other patents of a similar character, his claim would lie.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield in order that I may answer the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Whatever may be the equitable amount due to the claimant, under a bill that has no limitation as to attorney's fees, there is no certainty as to what the claimant himself will get. Does the gentleman from Tennessee think that it is a safe or proper practice for Congress now to adopt, to pass a claims bill with no limitations on the attorney's fee?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, Mr. Speaker, I see no real necessity for answering that question——

Mr. CRAMTON. Not a particle of necessity——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But I will say that I do not think that Congress ought to interfere with a contract. However, the attorney's fee question is not involved in this request to go to conference. The only reason why I have interposed was that this claim must not be prejudiced by remarks, not made by the gentleman from Michigan, but by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], that the bill has been lobbied through for three times as much as the claimant wanted.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to say that the Supreme Court in the Massey case held that the Congress could fix the rate for attorney's fees.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Why do you not have it fixed in all cases? You ought to have a general law.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am willing to make it general.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield further, the practice is well established, so far as I know, as to all of these claims. For instance, we discussed it at length on Wednesday in connection with Indian claims, where it has been settled that 10 per cent should be the limit, and we have considered going further than that in some cases and providing that in no event should the amount be over $25,000.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What I am suggesting is that we ought to pass a general statute as to all these claims, providing a maximum fee, if you desire, and a minimum fee, so that it will apply to all bills alike. We discussed this in the Ways and Means Committee with reference to certain limitations, the report having come to Congress that claims for tax refunds are costing the taxpayers 50 per cent of their refunds and some of them running as high as $300,000 and $400,000 on one claim. It seems to me it will not be long before Congress will have to take charge and see whether a taxpayer is overcharged for the services of an attorney, so it seems to me Congress should take a comprehensive view of it and pass a general statute as to applications for refunds out of the Treasury and for appropriations out of the Treasury by Congress.

Mr. CRAMTON. As far as I am concerned, I am not disposed to oppose any such limitation, however broad it is, but until that good time arrives I do not want to see any claim bill go through without a limitation, and it has this much weight with me, that if I did not fully trust the committee that is going to have charge of it in conference and feel sure they would not permit the bill to go through as it passed the Senate, I should object to its going to conference at all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following conferees: Messrs. STRONG of Kansas, SINCLAIR, and LOWREY.

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS MEMORIAL LIGHTHOUSE AT SANTO DOMINGO

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file a supplemental report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on House Joint Resolution 354, authorizing the appropriation of the sum of $871,655 as the contribution of the United States toward the Chistopher Columbus Memorial Lighthouse at Santo Domingo.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to file a supplemental report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs on House Joint Resolution 354, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Were any minority views filed?

Mr. PORTER. No. I will say for the information of the gentleman that some question arose as to the cost of maintaining this memorial after it was constructed. I received information yesterday from the Dominican Government that it was perfectly willing to pay all the expenses of maintenance, and that is what I have put in the supplemental report.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is a memorial to Christopher Columbus?

Mr. PORTER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Who was not a Nordic.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KNUTSON, at the request of Mr. CLAGUE, on account of sickness.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration:

Senate Joint Memorial 5

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Whereas there is now pending a bill in the Congress of the United States, introduced by Senator HARRIS, of Georgia, providing for an amendment to the immigration laws of the United States so as to place Mexico under the quota provisions applying to other nations; and

Whereas under present conditions many thousands of Mexicans are entering the United States without any restrictions, and the cheaper labor of Mexico is rapidly coming in competition with American labor, and if this condition continues the standard of the American worker will be greatly lowered; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of Oregon feels that this condition is unjust and should be promptly remedied: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Oregon (the House of Representatives jointly concurring therein), That we, your memorialists, the Senate of the State of Oregon, the House of Representatives concurring, respectfully request and petition the Congress of the United States to promptly pass the legislation hereinabove referred to, placing Mexico under the same quota provisions concerning immigration as apply to other nations; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Oregon be, and he hereby is, requested and directed to forthwith transmit a certified copy of this joint memorial to the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, urging their support on behalf of the matter embraced in this memorial.

A. W. NORBLAD,
President of the Senate.

Concurred in by the house of representatives January 25, 1929.

(Indorsed: Senate Joint Memorial No. 5, introduced by Senator Moser and Representative Anderson, John P. Hunt, chief clerk. Filed: January 28, 1929, Hal E. Hoss, secretary of state.)

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
Office of the Secretary of State.

I, Hal E. Hoss, secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify: That I have carefully compared the annexed copy of Senate Joint Memorial No. 5 with the original thereof adopted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Thirty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon and filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon January 28, 1929, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all indorsements thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

STATE OF IOWA,
SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Ed. M. Smith, secretary of state of the State of Iowa, keeper and custodian of the acts and resolutions of the general assemblies, do hereby certify that the attached instrument in writing is a true and correct copy of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 5 as adopted by the Forty-third General Assembly of Iowa.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the official seal of the secretary of state at the capitol in Des Moines this 30th day of January, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.] ED. M. SMITH, Secretary of State.

Senate Concurrent Resolution 5 (by Shaff), memorializing the Congress of the United States to adopt an adequate tariff schedule on molasses imported for the manufacturing of industrial alcohol

Whereas the corn growers of the Corn Belt have met with a limited demand for corn that has been produced and not used for feeding purposes the past several years; and

Whereas because of this lack of demand and the depressed condition of agriculture generally the price of corn has been substantially below the cost of production in this Corn Belt area; and

Whereas one of the greatest single contributing factors in placing agriculture on a parity with other industries is that the price of corn be such as to allow the producer an adequate return for his labor and investment; and

Whereas the dairy and livestock feeding industry would be benefited by the further use and manufacture of corn incident to the making of industrial alcohol and the large amount of distillers' dried grains that would arise therefrom; and

Whereas this would furnish a splendid demand for low-grade corn not well fitted for commercial usage: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of Iowa (the House concurring), That we petition and pray the Congress of the United States to amend the tariff schedule as affecting the duty on molasses imported for the manufacture of industrial alcohol to such an extent that it will be more economical to use corn in its manufacture than to use imported molasses; be it further

Resolved, That on the passage of this resolution the secretary of state shall certify a copy hereof each to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce at Washington, D. C.

Introduced January 28, 1929.

Taken up by unanimous consent.

Adopted.

WALTER H. BEAM,
Secretary of the Senate.

To the house January 29, 1929.

Rule 34 suspended; resolution adopted.

A. C. GUSTAFSON, Chief Clerk.

RATING OF FLYING SCHOOLS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I report favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 5350) to amend the air commerce act of 1926 with reference to the examination and rating of schools giving instruction in flying and I submit a report (No. 1606) thereon.

I call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 6, before the word "examination," to strike out "annual" and insert "necessary," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 (d) of the air commerce act of 1926 is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and adding a semicolon and the following: "and provide for the necessary examination and rating of civilian schools giving instruction in flying, as to the adequacy of the course of instruction, as to the suitability and airworthiness of the equipment, and as to the competency of the instructors."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Connecticut should make a brief statement in explanation of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to do so. When the air commerce act was passed in 1926 there were only one or two flying schools in the country, and it did not occur to anybody to give the Department of Commerce the duty of rating those schools in case a rating should be asked for. At the present time, however, there are nearly 250 such schools, and they are springing up every day. No one knows whether they are good, bad, or indifferent, and there is no method of finding out. Some of them, with unlicensed pilots and unlicensed planes, are attempting to instruct pupils. The bill is for the protection of those who desire to learn flying. It is not compulsory.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What power does it propose to give the Department of Commerce?

Mr. BINGHAM. It merely adds to the functions of the Department of Commerce the duty to rate flying schools just as the department to-day has the duty of rating airports and other air navigation facilities when such a rating is asked for. So far as I know, there is no objection to the passage of the bill, but there is a very general demand for it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether there is any provision in the bill which will prohibit States from licensing schools which are engaged in teaching aeronautics?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all. The bill does not propose to interfere with State rights in any particular.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the bill accompanied by a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. JONES. It is.

Mr. KING. The bill, as I understand, proposes to give the Federal Government the power to license and rate flying schools.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is not a question of licensing flying schools, but merely rating them, just as the Government now rates airports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce to the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE DISTRICT CODE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, from the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2366) to amend subchapter 1 of chapter 18 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia relating to degree-conferring institutions, and move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator state the effect of the House amendments?

Mr. CAPPER. I ask that the House amendments may be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, strike out lines 15 to 18, inclusive, and insert:

2. That any such degree shall be awarded only after such quantity and quality of work shall have been completed as are usually required by reputable institutions awarding the same degree and approved by the Board of Education of the District of Columbia: Provided, That if more than one-half the requirements for any degree are earned by correspondence or extramural study such fact shall be conspicuously noted upon the diploma conferred: Provided further, That no diploma shall be issued conferring a degree in medicine or any healing art, or in law, for study pursued or work done by correspondence.

And on page 4, line 22, after the word "thereof," insert:

And provided further, That after notice has been given as hereinabove provided and during said 30-day period or during the time said decision is under review by the Supreme Court, no diploma shall be awarded or degree conferred by the licensee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BLAINE, Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. COPELAND conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Finance Committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 5187) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution in Washington, D. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of S. 5187 and that the bill be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not understand what the Senator said the bill is.

Mr. DENEEN. It is a bill to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution in Washington, D. C.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It should properly have gone to the Committee on the District of Columbia?

Mr. DENEEN. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Committee on Finance is discharged from further consideration of the bill, and the bill is referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7939) to authorize settlement of damages to persons and property by Army aircraft, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SMOOT, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 5473) granting a pension to Mary H. Goldberger, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 16714, the naval appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place under "Public works, Bureau of Yards and Docks," insert:

"Navy yard, Puget Sound, Wash.: Extension of Dry Dock No. 2 (limit of cost, $700,000), $400,000."

OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSIONS—PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF RULE XXXVIII, PARAGRAPH 2

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to present a notice and ask that it may be read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I hereby give notice that on Monday, February 4, or as soon thereafter as may be possible, I shall move to amend paragraph 2 of Rule XXXVIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate, relating to proceedings on nominations in executive session, so as to make paragraph 2 of said rule read as follows:

"2. Nominations shall be considered in open executive session unless the Senate, in closed executive session, shall by a majority vote determine that any particular nomination shall be considered in closed executive session. When nominations are so considered in executive session all information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret; and all roll calls in closed executive session, together with a statement of the question upon which such roll calls are had, shall be published in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a speech made by the Hon. Orville H. Platt, of the State of Connecticut, April 13, 1886, dealing with this very matter. The speech was brought to my attention just this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The speech referred to is as follows:

OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSIONS

SPEECH OF HON. ORVILLE H. PLATT, OF CONNECTICUT, IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, TUESDAY, APRIL 13, 1886

The Senate having under consideration the resolution submitted by Mr. Platt, January 29, 1886, and reported adversely from the Committee on Rules, February 8, 1886, relating to the consideration of executive nominations in open sessions of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] submitted amendments to the resolution. The resolution will be read as proposed to be modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, That Executive nominations shall hereafter be considered and acted upon in open session, except when otherwise ordered by vote of the Senate, and so much of section 2, Rule XXXVI, and section 2, Rule XXXVIII, of the standing rules of the Senate as conflict with or is inconsistent with the above is to the extent of such inconsistency rescinded."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution being pending, the Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, this is a political question which I propose to discuss; a political question but in no sense a question of party politics. It rises above all party politics, and should be discussed upon a higher plane than mere partisan questions are usually discussed. I consider it to be to-day the most needed measure of administrative reform in this Government, and I wish to discuss it from the standpoint of deliberate and dispassionate argument and reason. My opinions in relation to the question have slowly changed, and I have come to-day to feel that the Senate of the United States can engage in no more important business than the change of its rules in respect to the consideration of executive business, especially so far as the business of nominations is concerned.

I desire at the outset to have it understood exactly what this question is and what it is not. It is a simple proposition to change the rule relative to the consideration of Executive nominations, so that in the future the rule shall be that they shall be considered in open session, leaving only the exceptional cases to be considered in secret session. The present rules upon this subject I shall read. The first rule which seems to relate to it is Rule XXXV.

"On a motion made and seconded to close the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Senator, require secrecy, the Presiding Officer shall direct the galleries to be cleared; and during the discussion of such motion the doors shall remain closed."

My resolution and the amendments which I have proposed do not interfere with this rule. Rule XXXVI, sections 2 and 3, is as follows:

"2. When acting upon confidential or executive business the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the principal legislative clerk, the executive clerk, the minute and journal clerk, the Sergeant at Arms, the Assistant Doorkeeper, and such other officers as the Presiding Officer shall think necessary, and all such officers shall be sworn to secrecy.

"3. All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Senators and the officers of the Senate kept secret; and all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

Rule XXXVIII, section 2, is as follows:

"2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret. If, however, charges shall be made against a person nominated, the committee may, in its discretion, notify such nominee thereof, but the name of the person making such charges shall not be disclosed. The fact that a nomination has been made, or that it has been confirmed or rejected, shall not be regarded as a secret."

Then, to refer again to Rule XXXVI, in section 4, which I desire to read, and which I can not read and which no Senator can hear read without a sense of personal degradation, we find the following:

"4. Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and to punishment for contempt."

So that if a Senator or an officer shall disclose any remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, or the votes upon the nominations, he is liable to expulsion from this body.

A history of legislative and executive proceedings of the different legislative bodies of the United States is exceedingly interesting, and I must to some extent refer to it in my remarks.

But first I desire to examine these rules so far as they enjoin secrecy. I suppose it is apprehended that this rule which makes a Senator liable to expulsion from this body if he communicates or discloses any of the remarks which have been made in secret session when the confirmation of a nomination is pending has been a rule from the foundation of the Government, and that when we seek to change the rule we are departing from the well-established practice of the fathers. But that is an entire mistake. The first rule for requiring any secrecy in the matter of executive nominations was passed on the 3d of January, 1820. Up to the 3d of January, 1820, there was no intimation or suggestion in the rules of the Senate that secrecy was enjoined or expected so far as action on nominations was concerned. Whatever of secrecy was implied was implied simply and purely because of the fact that the Senate sat with closed doors, but so far as the rules were concerned no secrecy whatever was enjoined in this respect.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut if up to that period all the proceedings of the Senate were not in secret session?

Mr. PLATT. I will come to that before I get through with this argument, and I think I shall show that the public sentiment of this country compelled the opening of these doors after they have been five years closed in legislative business, and I think I shall show that the same public sentiment now demands that they shall be opened as a rule upon the consideration of executive nominations.

As I said, the first rule in regard to nominations was adopted January 3, 1820. It is to be found in the report of the Senate Committee on Rules, page 34, when, for the first time, the Senate enacted a rule that—

"All information on remarks touching or concerning the character or qualifications of any person nominated by the President to office shall be kept secret."

But no penalty, mark you, was attached at that time. No penalty was attached by the rules to any disclosure of the executive proceedings of the Senate until 1844, when this rule was enacted:

"Any officer or member of the Senate convicted of disclosing"—

Now, mark—

"for publication any written or printed matter directed by the Senate to be held in confidence shall be liable, if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and in case of a Member, to suffer expulsion from the body."

The rule requiring that information and remarks concerning the character and qualification of Members had then been in existence for 14 years; and yet when the Senate in 1844 proposed to attach a penalty for the disclosure of the secrets of executive session, it was expressly confined to the "disclosing for publication any written or printed matter directed by the Senate to be held in confidence," and it was not until 1868 that the present rule, which I have said no Senator can read and no Senator can hear read without a sense of personal degradation, was adopted—March 25, 1868:

"Any Senator or officer of the Senate who shall disclose the secret or confidential business or proceedings of the Senate shall be liable, if a Senator, to suffer expulsion from the body; and if an officer, to dismissal from the service of the Senate, and to punishment for contempt."

Remarks and information touching the character and qualifications of a candidate having been made secret, of course that rule now applies to such remarks and information.

So it is seen that the departure from the practice of the fathers has been toward the establishment of a rigid iron-bound rule of secrecy, the violation of which is the expulsion of the Member. It has been in my judgment a departure from the spirit of the fathers in direct opposition to the will and best interests of the people and against the general welfare of the Government.

Now what is my resolution? That there may be no mistake about it I will read it as it will be if the amendment which I have proposed shall be adopted:

"Resolved, That Executive nominations shall hereafter be considered and acted upon in open session except when otherwise ordered by the Senate. And so much of section 2, Rule XXXVI, and section 2, Rule XXXVIII, of the standing rules of the Senate as conflict with or is inconsistent with the above is to the extent of such inconsistency rescinded."

The objection which I have most frequently heard is the one of which I have spoken, that this practice of sitting with closed doors is of long standing, dates back to the formation of the Constitution and the commencement of the sessions of the Senate, and the inference is that whatever is old is wise and good and should be retained and never departed from. But I have shown that the departure has been in the line of more rigid secrecy and in the line of punishing for a disclosure of the secrets of the Senate, and I have to remind Senators that no great measure of reform in this world has ever made progress that did not make it over the ramparts of custom and tradition.

It seems to me that the answer may be rested on the history of the rule as I have cited it to the Senate. That whatever secrecy was implied from closed doors existed, I admit. It existed from the start. That any more secrecy than is implied by closed doors existed at the time of the commencement of the sessions of the Senate, I deny. That any greater secrecy existed in relation to the consideration of executive business than existed with the consideration of legislative business while the Senate sat with closed doors, I deny. It was not until 1800, 11 years after the Senate commenced its sessions and 6 years after the doors were opened in legislative business, that any rule of secrecy was applied to any kind of business transacted in executive session. So whatever secrecy the fathers observed for six years after the Senate was opened as to legislative business was the same secrecy with regard to executive business that they adopted with regard to legislative business and no more. I shall endeavor to show by some references to history, as briefly made as I can, that that was not a very rigid rule of secrecy; that even in the Continental Congress, which sat with closed doors, and in the legislative sessions of the Senate, which for the first five years were held with closed doors, there was no rigid secrecy maintained. Members of the House, the newspapers, knew what was being discussed in the legislative sessions of the Senate although the doors were closed.

I have said that the Continental Congress sat with closed doors, but it was early in the history of the Continental Congress that Alexander Hamilton introduced the following motion, to be found on page 52 of Elliot's Debates, fifth volume:

"A motion was made by Mr. Hamilton, seconded by Mr. Wilson, that whereas Congress were desirous that the motives and views of their measures should be known to their constituents in all cases where the public safety would admit, when the subject of finances was under debate the doors of Congress should be open."

Mr. HOAR. What is the date of that?

Mr. PLATT. February, 1783. That was in the Continental Congress, and I call attention to Mr. Hamilton's preamble and I commend it to Senators in the consideration of this resolution:

"Whereas Congress"—

It is not whereas the people were desirous of knowing what Congress was doing, but—

"Whereas Congress were desirous that the motives and views of their measures should be known to their constituents in all cases where the public safety would admit, etc."

That is the doctrine which ought to-day to prevail in the Senate of the United States. The Senate of the United States ought to desire that their constituency should know what they are doing here and the discussions which take place upon any and all measures which may be before the Senate.

The first Congress was to meet March 4, 1789, but a quorum not assembling the House of Representatives did not organize until April 1, 1789, and then transacted no business except of a mere formal character. On the 6th of April, 1789, a quorum of the Senate appeared and, as Senators know, the votes for President and Vice President were counted. On the 8th of April, two days afterwards, the House of Representatives, departing from the custom established, threw open the doors of the House for the transaction of all business, and, except in rare instances of public danger, those doors have never been closed since. John Adams, writing to his wife on the 19th of April, 1789, said:

"Before this, I presume, the printers in Boston have inserted in their gazettes the debates of the House of Representatives, which are conducted with open galleries. This measure, by making the debates public, will establish the National Government or break the confederation. I can conceive of no medium between these extremes."

The Senate did not open its doors, but a resolution to conduct the legislative sessions of the Senate with open doors was introduced very early. The Senate meeting in April, 1789, in the following April, 1790, on the 29th of the month, a resolution for open legislative sessions was offered, as we are told in Maclay's notes, by the Senators from Virginia. The Senators from Virginia were then William Henry Lee and William Grayson. I desire to correct myself. That motion was not offered by the Senators from Virginia, but was, as Maclay tells us, laid on the table at the instance of the Virginia Senators. Grayson died, and James Monroe succeeded him, and took his seat in February, 1791, and on the 24th of February, 1791, as soon as possible after taking his seat he renewed the motion that the legislative sessions of the Senate should be with open doors. That was debated for two days in the Senate, and was defeated by a vote of 9 to 17. The record of it is to be found in Senate Journal, volume 1, pages 281 to 287.

March 26, 1792, the motion was again renewed by Monroe; it was then defeated by a vote of 8 to 17. April, 1792, the motion was varied, and the motion was then to admit to the discussions in the Senate two persons who might be recommended by each Member of the House of Representatives. That was also defeated, 6 to 16.

On the 4th of February, 1793, a resolution was offered, as follows:

"Resolved, That the conducting of the legislative and judicial powers of the Senate in public, and suffering an account of their measures and deliberations to be published in the newspapers, is the best means of diffusing general information concerning the principles, motives, and conduct of individual Members; and that, by withholding this information, responsibility becomes unavailing, the influence of their constituents over one branch of the Legislature in a great measure annihilated, and the best security which experience has devised against the abuse of power and a maladministration abandoned."

It was negatived by yeas 7, nays 21; but I call the attention of Senators to the language of this resolution, because it is as pertinent in relation to the conduct of ordinary executive business as it was with regard to legislative business. On the same day a motion was made to agree to another resolution, in these words:

"Resolved, therefore, That it be a standing rule that the doors of the Senate Chamber remain open whilst the Senate shall be sitting in a legislative and judicative capacity, except on such occasions as, in their judgment, may require secrecy; and that this rule shall commence and be enforced on the first day of the next session of Congress."

That resolution got 10 votes in this body, and there were 18 against it. So that the proposition all the time gained, as the present proposition has all the while gained and will all the while gain until it shall be adopted.

Then the Senate on the 11th day of February of that year, very much as we brought into this Senate the discussion of matters which were raised upon the consideration of nominations by the resolutions of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, voted without division that the discussion and consideration of the question of whether Albert Gallatin, elected a Senator from Pennsylvania, was qualified for a seat in the Senate, it being objected that he had not been nine years a citizen of the United States, should be with open doors. It was so held; and the result of it was that it being once seen that a question of a legislative character could be discussed with open doors without any prejudice to the public interests, the Senate on the 24th of the same month passed a resolution that at the commencement of the next session the legislative sessions of the Senate should be open and that a gallery should be constructed.

I have referred to this to show how the measure grew from the time when Alexander Hamilton introduced his resolution in the Continental Congress, which received only the affirmative vote of the State of Pennsylvania, to the time when, as Hildreth in his history says, public sentiment compelled the doors of the Senate to be opened when it was sitting in a legislative capacity.

It will be observed that on the same day that this resolution for opening the doors was passed, the present rule, the rule which stands to this day, that the Senate should upon the motion of any Senator, seconded by another Senator, close its doors, was enacted. It seems to have been a kind of compromise, something such as is now suggested, that when any matter relating to a nomination comes up which in the judgment of the Senate should be conducted with closed doors the Senate may by vote order it so to be done.

It is interesting to note a fact of which we are told, that the first motion to conduct the legislative sessions of the Senate with open doors having been laid on the table at the instance of the Senators from Virginia, James Monroe came, at the next session, to the Senate instructed by a vote of the Legislature of Virginia to renew the motion and to press it to a favorable conclusion. I will not stop to refer to the interesting character of that debate, as shown by contemporaneous history. The resolution which I have referred to, of February 4, 1793, shows the line along which it must have been conducted. I think I will make a single reference to Maclay's notes, pages 296 and 297, for the purpose of showing that the very same arguments were urged against open legislative sessions which are now urged against open executive sessions.

The Virginia Senators having mentioned their instructions—

"This brought the subject of instructions from the different legislatures into view—"

Which I do not care to refer to. Senator Maclay spoke on the main question. He says:

"As to the late conduct of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, I spoke with but few of them. I had no instructions from them, and, all things considered, I was happy that I had given my voice on a former occasion for it."

That was for open session—

"The reasons which I gave then operated still in full force on my mind.

"The first was: That I knew of no reason for keeping the door of any legislative assembly open that did not apply with equal force to us.

"The second was: That I thought it a compliment due to the smallest State in the Union to indulge them in such request.

"The objections against it—"

And I ask Senators to note these objections, because they are the same which are raised to-day in regard to open sessions in executive matters—

"namely: That the Members would make speeches for the gallery and for the public papers, would be the fault of the Members. If they waged war in words and oral combats; if they pitted themselves like cocks; or played the gladiator for the amusement of the idle and curious, the fault was theirs. That let who would fill the chairs of the Senate, I hoped discretion would mark their deportment. That they would rise to impart knowledge, and listen to obtain information. That while this line of conduct marked their debates, it was totally immaterial whether thousands attended, or there were not a single spectator."

I have said that the rule of secrecy had been very slight, if any. I think there was really none. The only question was whether the public should be permitted to hear the debates, not whether the debates should be communicated by Members to persons outside, and the correspondence and contemporaneous writings of that day show that Members of the Senate did not hesitate to tell what was said and done in the Senate, and one curious instance I will stop to refer to. Maclay, on page 269, speaking of the vote upon the memorial which had been sent from Pennsylvania to the Senate against the funding of the public debt, which was then under consideration, says this:

"Mr. Morris—"

A Pennsylvania Senator—

"was the only nay. I was in good humor myself, although I considered the vote of this day as waging a war with the public creditors, in which I will most probably lose my reelection, and was sorry to see my colleague manifest such a degree of peevishness. He left the Senate Chamber immediately after the vote."

Now, I want to refer to the writing of Fisher Ames. On the 23d of December, which was the day on which the vote was taken, writing to Thomas Dwight, of Connecticut, he says:

"The creditors in this State have sent us a huffing memorial, which I inclose. It came in when the price of debt affords an answer to it. No notice was taken of it. The Senate, I hear, have proposed to answer them by resolving that a revision of the funding act is improper."

That was in the commencement of his letter. At the end of it he says:

"The Senate have just voted, R. Morris only dissenting, in substance as I stated before. I wonder how the petitioners could overcome their Philadelphia modesty so far as to present such a ——— memorial. You may fill the blank for yourself."

Showing that Mr. Morris, being the only "nay" in the Senate, took his hat, rushed out of the Senate and rushed into the House and poured his woes into the ear of Fisher Ames. It is only one of numerous curious instances which show that there was no rule of secrecy unless it was upon particular matters in which there was a special effort made to keep them secret.

As I have said, there had been no rule of the Senate involving secrecy in any particular. The rules of the Senate were first adopted April 16, 1789, were 19 in number, and may be found in its Journal, volume 1, page 13. Nothing was said about keeping any of the proceedings, either legislative or executive, secret. The only rule of the Senate in relation to executive nominations adopted prior to December 22, 1800, was adopted on the 21st of August, 1789, and is the rule which is now in force in relation to the conduct of public business when executive nominations are considered. It is to be found in Executive Journal, volume 1, page 19, and it is in these words:

"Resolved, That when nominations shall be made in writing by the President of the United States to the Senate, a future day shall be assigned, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise, for taking them into consideration. That when the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber, the President of the Senate shall have a chair on the floor, be considered as at the head of the Senate, and his chair shall be assigned to the President of the United States. That when the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the President of the Senate and Senators shall attend at the place appointed. The Secretary of the Senate shall also attend to take the minutes of the Senate.

"That all questions shall be put by the President of the Senate, either in the presence or absence of the President of the United States; and Senators shall signify their assent or dissent by answering, viva voce, 'aye' or 'no.'"

Is it not remarkable, if any more secrecy were implied as to executive business than as to legislative business, that when they were adopting this first rule for the conduct of executive business there should not have been some mention in it that these proceedings should be kept secret?

It ran on, then, without any further rule on the subject, for six years after the Senate adopted a resolution that the legislative sessions should be open. December 22, 1800, the Senate passed this rule; it is the first rule in the Senate with regard to secrecy, and let us see what it applied to; it did not apply to the consideration of nominations:

"Resolved, That all confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be by the Members thereof kept inviolably secret; and that all treaties which may hereafter be laid before the Senate shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall by their resolution take off the injunction of secrecy."

Does some one say the confidential communications included executive nominations? That is shown not to be the case by the occasion on which it was adopted. It was adopted upon the transmission of a message of John Adams, then President of the Senate, submitting instructions given to the envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French Republic in the following words:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In conformity with your request in your resolution of the 19th of this month, I transmit you the instructions given to our late envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the French Republic.

It is my request to the Senate that these instructions may be considered in strict confidence, and returned to me as soon as the Senate shall have made all the use of them they may judge necessary.

JOHN ADAMS.

UNITED STATES, December 22, 1800.

If the Senate had been considering all messages sent by the President to the Senate as secret, why did he in the message request them to consider this particular measure in strict confidence? The fact that the rule was adopted in relation to confidential communications on the reception of this message shows plainly the character of the communications to which it was applied. It was to communications of the character that had just been transmitted to the Senate only. In that case the instructions given to Minister Short to France, and to-day that is what we understand by the term "confidential communications." That was six years, as I said, after legislative sessions had been adopted. During these six years nominations and confirmations were published daily in the newspapers, or at least every few days.

There are some very curious things to be found in the Executive Journal, if it be said that there was any rigid secrecy maintained in regard to such matters; for instance, on page 149 of the first volume of the Executive Journal I find this:

"That the Secretary of the Senate pay no further compensation to the printers for the weekly publication of the Journals."

So that in that early day, just about the time that the Senate concluded to hold its legislative sessions with open doors, for some reason or other (and it appears to have been a newspaper warfare) the Secretary of the Senate in executive session was instructed to pay no further compensation to newspapers for the publication of the Journals.

The most important event that occurred in those days was the nomination of Mr. Jay to be envoy extraordinary of the United States to His Britannic Majesty for the purpose of negotiating a treaty of commerce and amity. It created a good deal of discussion not only in the Senate but in the country, and a reference to the public journals of that day shows that the country understood perfectly well what that discussion was in the Senate. It turned on the question of whether we wanted any treaty with a power with which we had been so recently at war, and it turned further upon this public question, whether a gentleman who was then one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States ought to be appointed as envoy extraordinary to England to negotiate that treaty without resigning his office upon the bench.

That nomination was confirmed on the 19th day of April, 1794, and on the 21st of April, 1794, two days thereafter, the Senate voted that any member of the Senate might have an extract from the Journal; but we find this very curious circumstance, that on that very 19th day of April, on which Mr. Jay was confirmed as envoy extraordinary, John Adams wrote his wife—to be found in page 156 of his letters—calling his wife, as he does in all of these letters, with touching sentiment his "dearest friend":

"The Senate has been three days in debate upon the appointment of Mr. Jay to go to London. It has this day been determined in his favor—18 versus 8."

That was before the Senate had allowed any person to take a copy of the proceedings; and under our rule now I understand that John Adams, then Vice President of the United States, would have been liable to expulsion for writing that to his wife It shows the difference between former times and the present time.

The most important epoch of that time following upon the nomination of Jay was the negotiation of the treaty, its return to the United States, and its ratification by the Senate. That treaty, for the first time in the history of the Senate, was received under an injunction of secrecy. It was communicated by George Washington. I will not stop to read the message. It was ordered that the Senators "be under an injunction of secrecy upon the the communication this day received from the President of the United States."

That was June 8, 1795, and yet they were holding open legislative sessions, and it is the first indication of a rule of secrecy or of any keeping of secrets to be found in the Executive Journal; and the contemporary historians tell us that great efforts were made to keep that treaty secret. John Adams, in writing to his wife, does not disclose anything about the contents of that treaty, but he says, "Mum, mum, mum." He treats it entirely different from the way in which he treated the question of Jay's nomination pending before the Senate.

If it had been the practice to receive everything under an injunction of secrecy, why should there have been a special order made that this treaty should be received under an injunction of secrecy? The treaty was ratified June 24, 1795. The next day many Senators were absent and the injunction of secrecy was removed, but it was reconsidered at the same session and the Secretary was directed to notify the absent Senators. They came in the next day, and they took the injunction of secrecy off from the proceedings, but they specially enjoined that no Member of the Senate should divulge a copy of that treaty. There was an effort to maintain secrecy something in the way we do at the present time. What was the result?

Before I come to the result I want to say this: James Madison, writing when that treaty was under consideration by the Senate to James Monroe, then minister to France, communicated about as good an abstract of the contents of the treaty to James Monroe as he could have done if he had seen the treaty itself; and yet he says the most extraordinary efforts in official quarters have been made to keep it secret and he has got no hint of it whatever from official quarters. But what was the result of this effort to keep the text of the treaty secret? The vote to keep the text of the treaty secret was on the 25th of June, 1795. On the 26th or 27th a really good sketch of the treaty was published in the Aurora, in Philadelphia, where the Senate was then holding its sessions, and on the 29th Mr. Mason, a Senator from Virginia, wrote a note to the editor of the Aurora stating that he had seen a sketch of the treaty, and as he desired that there should be no inaccuracies and the public should understand just what it was, inasmuch as the sketch had been published, he sent him a copy of the treaty which he was at liberty to do with as he pleased; and it was published the next day in pamphlet form, and the next day after that, in the Daily Advertiser, and it flew all over the country with lightning rapidity. That was the way they used to keep secrets in those days. I refer to it merely for the purpose of showing not that they violated the injunction of secrecy, but that this was an individual instance where, on account of great considerations relating to the public welfare, an injunction of secrecy was put on in the executive sessions of the Senate. It is curious in this instance to remark too that Washington, just a day before the publication of the treaty, at the instance of Senator Mason, had directed it to be published so that the people might not be misinformed about it.

There are plenty of indications, if I could stop to enumerate them, to show that absolute secrecy was not observed or required in reference to executive proceedings, but that the whole matter was left to the judgment of Senators, supposing that when there was any subject the telling of which would go against—as Alexander Hamilton said in his resolution—public safety, then the Senators would have prudence and judgment enough to keep it secret. That was the original idea, and that was the only injunction of secrecy in those early days.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to ask the Senator whether the order for the publication of the Jay treaty was not made for the purpose of eliciting discussion throughout the country in order that Members of the Senate might know what disposition to make of that treaty? It certainly did lead to a very extended discussion in Boston, New York, Charleston, and all over the country; very able speeches were made in reference to the provisions of that treaty. I wish to find out from the Senator whether the order for publication was not made in order that the Members of the Senate might be informed by their constituents as to the public opinion in reference to the treaty.

Mr. PLATT. I must have been unfortunate in not making myself clear. The injunction of secrecy which was especially ordered by the Senate, and the first injunction of secrecy ever ordered by it in relation to any matter pending before it in executive session, was rigidly observed—rigidly observed both in executive quarters and in the Senate. The greatest efforts were made to do so, and the Senate by vote enjoined that although the proceedings by which it was ratified in the Senate might be made public, no Senator should make the treaty public until after the ratifications had been exchanged by the President. It was in direct violation of that that the treaty was published. It was not till after it had gone through with this discussion in the Senate, where it had been discussed for three weeks in a special called session of the Senate—it was not till after its ratification by the Senate that it leaked out and was published.

I have said that in 1820 a rule was adopted that the remarks and information communicated by a Senator upon the consideration of a nomination should be kept secret and it had been attempted once before in 1813 in the Senate, and I refer to this because it is particularly important. The records in the Executive Journal are too long for me to read and detain the Senate with. The history of the attempt will be found in Senate Executive Journal, volume 2, pages 374 to 415.

The effort was made in executive session to adopt the very rule that was afterwards adopted in 1820, namely, that a Senator should not be permitted to divulge remarks or information communicated by a Senator upon the consideration of executive nominations. It failed signally. It went through all the forms of reference and report, and finally was dropped. So in 1813 the attempt was made to enjoin secrecy and failed, and it was not until 1820 that the Senate succeeded in adopting any rule of secrecy applicable to what was said in executive session with regard to nominations. The fact that it failed in 1813 shows that it was not the rule or the practice at that time. This binding the Senate down by this iron rule of secrecy with regard to what is said respecting the character and qualifications of a person nominated to office is a recent matter.

But, Mr. President, I must not encumber the RECORD with more citations from the Executive Journal—which is an interesting book, if Senators will study it—upon this subject. I have only alluded to one or two things as illustrating my proposition, but I wish before I come to the more practical and argumentative part of my remarks to enumerate hurriedly the efforts that have been made in open session of the Senate to do away with this rule.

Much of the history of this subject is contained in the Executive Journals of the Senate since 1829. Up to that date the Executive Journals were published by order of the Senate, but since that date they are kept secret, no one other than Senators, the officers of the Senate sworn to secrecy, and the President may know the history of the country contained in those secret books, and if I refer to it I am liable to expulsion. But I may refer to what has been done in legislative session.

On February 20, 1841, Senator William Allen, of Ohio, introduced a resolution for open sessions. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] the other day in the discussion of the question of the production of papers by the Executive referred to this Senator as "Uncle Billy Allen," and I take it it was not a term of reproach, but a term rather of endearment. Certainly he was a Senator representing the great State of Ohio, and he introduced this resolution:

"Resolved, That the fortieth rule for conducting business in the Senate, and which requires the Senate to close its doors when in executive business, be rescinded, except as to the action of the Senate on treaties."

That was laid on the table by a vote of 26 to 20. It was laid on the table, I have no doubt, to cut off discussion; but the fact that 20 to 26 Senators in that day voted to not lay it on the table shows that it had some strength and support even as far back as 1841. Senator Allen never got an opportunity to discuss that again in open Senate. He renewed it at every session of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him if there was anything like a party vote appearing in that case?

Mr. PLATT. I think not.

Mr. ALLISON. No party division?

Mr. PLATT. I think not, but here are the yeas and nays; the Senator can tell from them. I have not examined them to see:

"YEAS—Messrs. Archer, Barrow, Bates, Bayard, Choate, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Dixon, Evans, Graham, Henderson, Huntington, Ker, Mangum, Miller, Morehead, Phelps, Porter, Prentiss, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Talmadge, and Woodbridge—26.

"NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, King, Linn, McRoberts, Monton, Nicholson, Pierce, Smith of Connecticut, Sturgeon, Tappan, Williams, Woodbury, Wright, and Young—20."

Senator Allen renewed his resolution again at the next session, February 23, 1842. No opportunity was given to discuss it then. A motion to go into executive session cut off the debate.

Then again he renewed it December 28, 1843. He renewed it again February 23, 1848, and it was again laid on the table by a decided vote, 39 to 13, probably an unfortunate time to press its consideration. I give the ayes and noes:

"YEAS—Messrs. Ashley, Badger, Baldwin, Bell, Berrien, Bradbury, Breese, Butler, Calhoun, Cass, Clarke, Corwin, Crittenden, Davis of Massachusetts, Dayton, Dix, Downs, Felch, Greene, Hunter, Johnson of Maryland, Johnson of Louisiana, Johnson of Georgia, Lewis, Mangum, Mason, Miller, Moor, Niles, Pearce, Phelps, Rusk, Sevier, Spruance, Sturgeon, Underwood, Upham, Webster, and Yulee—39.

"NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Atherton, Bagby, Bright, Clayton, Davis of Mississippi, Dickinson, Douglas, Hale, Hannegan, Houston, and Turney—13."

At the special session in 1853 Senator Chase, of Ohio, introduced the following resolution, thus supplementing the effort of his predecessor, Senator Allen:

"Resolved, That all sessions and all proceedings of the Senate shall be public and open, except when matters communicated in confidence by the President shall be received and considered, and in such other cases as the Senate by resolution from time to time shall specially order; and so much of the thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, and fortieth rules as may be inconsistent with this rule is hereby rescinded."

That resolution was discussed at some length. It was supported by Senators Chase, Borland of Arkansas, and Sumner, the predecessor of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, from whose speech I desire to read a single quotation:

"At the first organization of the Government the proceedings of the Senate, whether in legislation or on treaties or on nominations, were with closed doors. In this respect the legislative business and executive business were conducted alike. This continued down to the second session of the Third Congress, in 1794, when, in pursuance of a formal resolution, the galleries were allowed to be opened so long as the Senate were engaged in their legislative capacity, unless in such cases as might, in the opinion of the Senate, require secrecy; and this rule has continued ever since. Here was an exercise of the discretion of the Senate, in obvious harmony with public sentiment and the spirit of our institutions.

"The change now proposed goes still further. It opens the doors on all occasions, whether legislative or executive, except when specially ordered otherwise. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] says that the Senate is a confidential body, and should be ready to receive confidential communications from the President. But this will still be the case if we adopt the resolution now under consideration. The limitation proposed seems ample for all exigencies, while the general rule will be publicity. The executive sessions with closed doors, shrouded from the public gaze and public criticism, constitute an exceptional part of our system, too much in harmony with the proceedings of other governments less liberal in character. The genius of our institutions requires publicity. The ancient Roman who bade his architect so to construct his house that his guests and all that he did could be seen by the world, is a fit model for the American people."

Let me also quote a single sentence from the speech of Senator Chase especially pertinent to the proposition now under consideration. It will be noticed that his resolution provided for open sessions upon the consideration of treaties as well as nominations. After speaking of the propriety of considering treaties in open session as a rule, he went on to say:

"So many and, indeed, almost all nominations are confirmed or rejected upon principles of public or party policy, without reference to private character. I see no reason why debates and votes upon these should not be public. Whenever any questions involving moral character are raised, it will be in the power of any committee or any member to move that the doors be closed."

The resolution went over after debate, and, as the session adjourned in two days thereafter, no action was taken.

Then at the following session of Congress Mr. Chase renewed his resolution. It was laid on the table without discussion, at the instance of Senator Mason, by a vote of 23 to 14. I give the yeas and nays:

"Yeas—Messrs. Allen, Badger, Bell, Butler, Cass, Cooper, Dawson, Dixon, Evans, Everett, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Johnson, Jones of Tennessee, Mason, Sebastian, Shields, Smith, Stuart, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Toucey—23.

"Nays—Messrs. Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Gwin, Hamlin, Norris, Pettit, Slidell, Sumner, Wade, Walker, Weller, and Williams—14." (Congressional Globe, 1st sess., 33d Cong., p. 240.)

The discussion of the subject came up in the Senate upon the resolution of Mr. Wade, submitted January 21, 1862, asking for a joint rule for legislative secret sessions upon important matters touching the conduct of the war. In that discussion the question of secret sessions was pretty thoroughly discussed. I will not stop now to refer to the discussion, because I see that I am consuming altogether more time than I had intended, and because I may wish to quote some extracts therefrom upon another point further on in my remarks.

To leave now the historical argument—and I think the practice of the fathers shows that it will be no very great departure from the principle which governed them if we should open the doors for the discussion of such nominations and such only as we think may properly be discussed with due regard to the public safety—leaving that branch of the argument I wish to come to more practical considerations; I wish to answer some of the other objections which are pressed against the proposition.

And here, Mr. President, I take my stand on the proposition enunciated by you on the 9th day of February last, when you said with great terseness and vigor and condensation of thought, "there ought to be no secrets whatever in this Government of ours, a government of the people." It comprehends the whole question. There is but one, and there can be but one, possible limitation to that proposition, and that is an absolute necessity for secrecy.

And now I propose to examine this question to see whether any such absolute necessity exists, and I believe that to all fair-minded Senators I can demonstrate that there is no such absolute necessity existing, and if I do then I ask their assent to this proposition, that unless that absolute necessity can be shown, unless public safety, public welfare, demand it, no consideration of convenience to a Senator and no desire or disinclination on the part of a Senator to evade responsibility of any kind whatever should lead him to give his vote for the continuance of the practice longer.

Secrecy is odious to every human being in this world except when he practices it himself. It is against the spirit of a free government. I said it was odious. Whenever you see secrecy you are suspicious that something is wrong. It is a relic of monarchical power and privilege that has no business in this day of democratic tendencies, and when we seek to make this Government even more actually democratic than it was expected to be by its founders. It is a lineal descendant of the privy council that has always been hated in this country. We demand that the President shall have no secrets from us. Why? We think that if he has secrets there is something that ought to be disclosed, that what is done in secret should be proclaimed on the housetops. Secrecy is as odious to us as it is to others when the President insists upon practicing it. But what do the people say to us? They say you demand that the President shall have no secrets from the Senate. We demand that the Senate shall have no secrets from the people. How are we to get away from the inexorable logic of that statement on the part of the people?

Mr. President, publicity is the cure of all evils, whether they be governmental or financial or social. Publicity is the one thing upon which we must most rely in this country for the correction of evils. Why do we investigate matters? We order here and in the other House investigation after investigation, because we think something is done in secret which ought to be revealed. We believe when we get the slightest inkling of anything which has been concocted in secret that something is wrong; that it is the duty of each branch of Congress to turn on the lights, and the people sustain us in it. Usually when that which was done in secret is dragged out into the light we find that something wrong has actually been done. It is as true now as it was 18 centuries ago that "men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil."

Now, I want to marshal for a moment the arguments which have been made in favor of secret sessions; and the first is this: The argument has always been made, it was made in the discussions to which I have referred, that open sessions will deter Senators from frankly and freely communicating what they know when bad men are nominated, and therefore objectionable men will be confirmed. Well, we have tried the secret system for 100 years; and do not bad men get confirmed now? And when we see that the secrecy system does not work, that it does not improve the standard of our civil service, is it not worth while to try the other course and see whether publicity will not improve it? I admit that the consideration of a nomination in open session may involve some unpleasant duties for Senators; but is this Senatorial life a bed of roses? Has it no unpleasant duties and no unpleasant consequences?

To imagine it to be a bed of roses requires all the imagination and stoicism of Guatomozin when he was stretched on his bed of torture. We have no such difficulty in relation to other matters involving the discussion of character. We have no difficulty in expressing our opinion with regard to individuals when they come up here in a way that brings them before the open sessions of the Senate. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. Harrison], in the speech he made the other day, did not have any hesitation in telling us what he thought about the appointments that had been made in the State of Indiana; and yet when every one of those appointments are considered by the Senate the doors must be closed, because the Senator from Indiana can not tell without unpleasant consequences to himself what he thinks and what he knows about the men who are nominated for office there.

Even the Senator from Kansas [Mr. Ingalls] finds no difficulty, when he desires to do it, to discuss the character of men nominated and appointed to office in open sessions of the Senate. I turn to the able speech which he made only the other day, and I read this:

"The postmaster at Sioux City, Iowa, was convicted and sentenced in Dakota for violation of the pension laws.

* * * * * * *

"In Rhode Island a Democratic postmaster was appointed who had been in the preceding three months arrested nine times for violation of the liquor law."

And so on, giving the names of the officers, what they had been arrested for. He finds no difficulty in doing that. We had a discussion here recently on the educational bill, and what did the Senator from Kansas do? He discussed openly in the open Senate a nomination then pending before the Senate in executive session, the nomination of Zach. Montgomery to be assistant attorney general for the Interior Department. Every word that he said was directly relevant and proper to be said in executive session on the consideration of that nomination; yet was there any trouble about it? Did the heavens fall? Was it unpleasant to the Senator? Was it unpleasant to anybody else?

Take another illustration. Take the applications that we have here for restoration to the Army of people who have been dismissed from the service. Is there ever any hesitation or shrinking on account of its being unpleasant for a Senator to say what he thinks about the men? I have here in my hand a quantity of reports where the whole record of the man is spread out on the records of the Senate. Some Senators seem to be more troubled with the idea that it would be unpleasant, not to produce the bad record of a man, but unpleasant to say those things about a man which would wound his feelings, perhaps when he is really a very good man, except that he is not calculated for or adapted to the office. But here in one case General Sherman accepts a man's dismissal for utter worthlessness, and yet there was a proposition to restore him to the Army discussed. I will not take time in referring to more of these.

One answer to that argument is that bad men will not be presented here for discussion; the incompetent will not be presented here for us to discuss as they are now presented, if it be understood that their characters and qualifications are open to public discussion and are to receive public consideration. The whole business of appointing men to office will change. We shall have fewer recommendations of bad men, fewer nominations of bad men, fewer confirmations of bad men, if publicity can attend the whole business of office-seeking and office-getting from the White House to the Senate.

I want to say this in reply to that argument: There are very few such cases, and they will be fewer. It may undoubtedly be pleasanter to say a harsh thing, or an unkind thing, or an unpleasant thing behind a man's back rather than to say it before his face; but is it fairer to say it; in justice and decency and fair play, ought we not to say with respect to any man nominated here before the public and the world just what we would say about him behind those closed doors? I think we had; but we shall have less frequent opportunity or occasion to say it if these doors are open. How rarely it is now that a Senator is called upon to say an unpleasant thing with regard to a person who is nominated for office here who is otherwise a good man, a man whose feelings you do not want to wound, whose sensibilities you do not want to hurt.

What Senator can remember the time when in executive session here such things have required to be said about any man? If we have those cases where a Senator does not really want to wound the sensibilities of a candidate, the rule which I desire the adoption of still permits our going into executive session with closed doors; but do Senators think they enjoy exemption as it is now? Do you think that the man whom a Senator talks about here does not know what that Senator says about him? If he is rejected, he knows that he is rejected for cause; he knows that he is rejected because his Senator has not stood by him, probably; but he surmises ten times as much as he would if that Senator's conduct and every word he said had been made public and open to the world. So this argument falls to the ground by its own weight. The consequences are more unpleasant now than they would be to take the responsibility in open session.

Let us test this argument a little more closely. A good many of us are lawyers. Do we hesitate to say in open court, when we are paid for it, what we think about the character of witnesses and parties in a cause? Not at all. No lawyer ever flinches from that duty. Why should we seek to flinch from it here? We are paid to do our duty here as elsewhere, and why should we flinch from doing it here any more than in court?

But again we have popular elections. Every four years a man is nominated for President, and from one end of the land to the other his whole character is discussed before the people. Senators go upon the stump; they say what they think about each candidate; his past record is dragged to light; every foible of his life is paraded; the whole question of his character and qualifications is everywhere discussed with the utmost publicity, and why should we seek to shield ourselves behind closed doors when persons are nominated to office by the President, when we never think of desiring to shield ourselves or evade the responsibility of saying what we think about the President himself when he is nominated for office?

So judges and governors are elected, governors by the people and judges sometimes by the people and sometimes by legislatures, elected openly, their characters canvassed openly. If a person thinks they are good men, nice men, but will not make good judges, he says it, and he says it openly. He is never deterred by any consideration that he will wound anybody's feelings from expressing what he thinks when a President is nominated, when a governor is to be elected, when judges are to be elected, or even a justice of the peace is to be elected. Why, then, should we become so nervous when we are asked to tell what we think about the character and qualifications of a man who is nominated for office by the President instead of by a convention? We ourselves are nominated and elected in open legislatures, where our characters are discussed, where our qualifications are considered, and our whole history is brought to light and arguments made pro and con. If a member of the legislature thinks we are fair men for some positions, but not for the Senate, does he ever forego the expression of that belief from the fear of wounding our tender susceptibilities?

Mr. President, we have election contests here sometimes. Look at the book which has been compiled by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, study the questions which have been raised here with regard to the admission and the expulsion of Members when questions of bribery to secure election, charges involving moral character, have been made against Senators and against the mode of their election; has there ever been any shutting of the doors to the investigation of those questions, and to the discusison of such issues from the fear of wounding a Senator's feelings? They have been investigated in open daylight; they have been discussed in open Senate, and you could no more have shut the Senate doors upon such discussions than you could shut them upon all legislative questions. Yet it is just as unpleasant for a Senator to say what he thinks about a person who has been certified as elected to the Senate, about his conduct and about the charges against him, as it is to say it with regard to the nomination of a man here. Take one noted case. My eye being on the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Logan] now brings it to my mind. For years and years there has been discussed here in open session the conduct of Fitz-John Porter, and that Senator has not hesitated to say what he thought boldly, openly, in view of the whole world, about that gentleman who is seeking to be restored to the Army, and when the bill passes, if it does pass, and when the President nominates him to be a colonel, if he ever does, then these doors must be shut in order to consider whether we shall confirm him or not. Then the character and conduct of Fitz-John Porter must be discussed in secret.

Sir, this argument becomes something of a farce when you look it in the eye. What is the essence of it? It is a plea for personal privilege on the part of Senators; it is a plea to be exempt from unpleasant duties. I like to be exempt from unpleasant duties, but I do not want to plead that and I do not believe any Senator wants to plead that when such exemption from public duty militates against the public welfare.

I want to say one thing more in reply to this argument. I have not been here as long as a good many Senators, but I have been here some years now. I affirm here now that I never have heard a word said in executive session which ought to have been said there or which any person thought ought to have been said there which might not just as well and just as appropriately have been said in open session in relation to the confirmation of nominations.

But another argument is that we shall consume a great deal of time and encumber the RECORD. If that argument is good, we had better go back to the days of secret legislative sessions. That was an argument used against opening the doors in legislative session; and if all debates were secret and we had no RECORD, and what a man said was not published in the RECORD, possibly we could get along with business a little more rapidly. Will we go back to secret legislation sessions on that account? If not, it is no argument against open executive sessions provided it be for the public welfare and the public interests that they shall be held. It is inconsistent with the last argument. The two can not stand together.

Again, another objection I have heard is that there will be cases where public policy and the conservation of the public morals require that they shall be discussed in secret session. Who ever heard of such a case? Who ever heard of a case discussed in secret session of the Senate that might not have been discussed openly and everything relating to it be published openly, without any prejudice to the public morals? It applies with much more force to cases in court than it does in the Senate; and yet no Senator here will stand up and say that the doors of the courts in this year 1886 shall be closed against any testimony in any case whatever. I think myself that the publication of very much which is done in court tends to debauch the public morals; but public sentiment is so far in favor of publicity and no secrecy that it will not permit, and it is right that it should not permit, the doors of the courts to be closed, even in cases where the details having a tendency to prejudice public morals are under discussion.

But it is said that there is a distinction between the capacity in which we act in executive matters and in which we act in legislative matters, and that in this distinction, in this difference between our duty as legislators and our duty in confirming or rejecting officers lies the real reason why we ought to act with closed doors. I admit that in a sense we are a part of the executive power; but when we thus act, exercising that duty and that function, we are still Senators, and the crucial test is this: If we are free from responsibility to the people when we act on the confirmation of nominees, when we discharge that portion of our duties which is executive, then I agree that it is quite proper to close the doors; but if we are Senators still, if we are responsible to the people for our trust, if we ought to report to the people how we discharge that trust, then the distinction which is sought to be drawn between our legislative and our executive functions falls entirely to the ground. I apprehend that we are Senators still, that we represent somebody still, that we are not beyond responsibility, that we are not beyond accountability for our trust, when we act in the matter of the confirmation of officers. The administration of law is involved in the confirmation of officers. The whole question of administration, whether the Government shall be well administered or poorly administered, is involved in the question of what officers are appointed and what officers are confirmed; and it is as important that the people should know in this regard and for this reason how officers are appointed as it is that they should know how the laws are made.

I want to read from the report made by Garrett Davis, upon the Sylvester case in relation to secrecy. It was a part of the report of the Judiciary Committee in the discussion of the power of the President to withhold papers:

Why should there be any secrecy in these matters?—

That is, in relation to removal from office—

"Secrecy is not an element of our system—its great and fundamental law is public opinion; and how can this be wisely and justly formed when the facts which are necessary to enlighten it are concealed as 'state secrets'? It is only falsehood and corruption, wrong and oppression, that are sought to be wrapped in darkness; the officer who means and acts well dreads not the sunlight. There may be rare cases where secrecy in the removal of public officers would promote the public good; but the mischief and immorality inseparable from such a system will preponderate a thousandfold."

It is doubly applicable to the matter of confirming officers rather than to their removal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business at this hour, being the resolution reported by the Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye] from the Committee on Foreign Relations, February 3, 1886.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be laid aside informally until the Senator from Connecticut concludes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be laid aside informally until the Senator from Connecticut concludes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PLATT. I thank the Senate. I will conclude without consuming very much more of the time of the Senate.

Is there any other argument than those which I have examined why we should continue these secret sessions? Yes; I have heard one other, that it is a senatorial prerogative which it is wise for us to maintain. I do not want to stop to discuss that question; but I believe that right in that argument perhaps is the greatest disinclination which some Senators may have to the opening of these doors; but I desire to say just this: There are two words which the people want to see expunged from the political vocabulary of this country, and it is time they were obsolete. Those words are "prerogative" and "privilege." If it were not for being alliterative I would say there are two more words they desire to see expunged, and those are "patronage" and "perquisites." The people desire to have done with them and we had better have done with them. This is no place to assert prerogative. We had better stand pretty close to the people and trust the people if we want them to trust us.

But I must do more than answer objections, Mr. President; I must take the affirmative. I say, then, we must do this thing in self-defense, as Senators and as a Senate.

This is not a popular body, either in the political or colloquial sense of the term; indeed, I have come to the conclusion that it is fast coming to be a very unpopular body in the estimation of the citizens of this country. Some Senators will say it never was intended to be a popular body; some Senators will say now, as we said in the Constitutional Convention, that here should be a body constituted with a long term to be elected not by the people, but by the States, to be removed from direct responsibility to the people, in order that they might check the tendencies to democratic extravagances; some men may say now, as they said then, that it was well to mold one branch of this legislature somewhat upon that branch of the English Parliament known as the House of Lords. Such seems to have been the idea of Senator Butler in the discussion in the Senate on the Chase resolution in 1853. I quote from Senator Butler's remarks (Appendix Congressional Globe, 32d Cong., 2d sess. p. 321):

"This is not a pure democracy. If the Government of the United States was an undisguised and simple democracy, perhaps the gentleman might well insist upon a resolution of this kind. They might make the Senate the arena for the discussion of every subject, as was done in Athens, or in democracies where the people directly had a vote. But we are a confederacy of organized republics, and we live under a Constitution—a Constitution by whose obligations I feel bound, as well as the usages under it."

But this Government was formed a century ago. The men who framed it made a theoretical democracy, but there were anomalies in that Government which they so founded, and the Senate is one of them. They were theoretical democrats, but they were far from being actual democrats; and whoever observes the signs of the times in this year will see that the day, not of theoretical democracy, but of actual democracy is hastening on to its accomplishment and completion. Whoever looks abroad, whoever notices what is going on in all civilized countries can not fail to see the great ground swell which is to lift the people of the world into more active and close participation in the affairs of government. It is well we should not shut our eyes to it; it is well to get away from this idea that we do not represent the people, that we represent the States.

What are the States we are sent to represent? Can you disconnect the States from the people of the States? By no means. The people are the States; and when it is said that a Senator represents here the State and is not directly responsible to the people, that is only a fiction; it is only a nominal representation. Our real responsibility is to the people of the State that we represent. What do I mean? Do I mean that the Senate is to be influenced by public clamor? No; I think myself I have as much courage to withstand public clamor as perhaps any Senator. I do not mean to be influenced by public clamor; but when I believe that public sentiment with great unanimity demands a thing I am going to be very careful to draw the distinction between that public sentiment and public clamor and not mistake the will of the people deliberately formed for public clamor.

No, Mr. President, the idea that we can set ourselves up above the people, not let the people know what we are doing, is not in accordance with the spirit of the age. This world has come to believe in the philosophy of the Divine Master, "And whosoever of you will be the chiefest shall be servant of all." That is what a Senator must be. As the President and the governor and every other officer within the body politic, he must be the servant of the people.

This means popular information and scrutiny of all governmental proceedings; it means better government; it means better administration; it means the abolition of all exclusiveness, of privilege, of prerogative, of aristocratic tendencies. For better or for worse, that day has come. The people are to be omnipotent in government.

What has this to do with secret sessions, says some one? The people believe that this Senate is aristocratic, that it holds itself above them, and does not consider itself responsible to them. I do not like to make that statement, but I believe it to be just and proper that I should make it, because I believe that to a large extent, to a much larger extent than Senators suppose, it is the view which the people have of this body that we intend here to maintain aristocratic privilege; that we intend here to maintain secret prerogative; that we intend here to put ourselves above responsibility to the people.

In this, Mr. President, the people are largely mistaken. They misunderstand us; they misunderstand the character and desires of Senators; but, notwithstanding, that is their belief, and nothing has done so much to create that belief and perpetuate it as the fact that we close these doors when we consider nominations to office. It is just because the Senate, from habit and custom, from a disposition not to depart from what are supposed to be the good old ways, maintain certain things, and among them this matter of secret sessions that the people think we have set ourselves above them.

The popular sentiment, Mr. President, is for open executive sessions with regard to nominations as a rule. It is not public clamor; it is real, true, and genuine popular sentiment. How is popular sentiment reflected in this country except by the press? I venture to say that of the nearly 14,000 newspapers in the land probably 10,000 of them, political or independent, a very large proportion of them, have declared their belief that this measure should be adopted. I am met by some Senator by saying that he does not care what the press says, that an issue has been raised between the press and the Senate, and he is not going to be influenced by any such consideration as that. I desire to say here one or two very frank words. With that journalism which concedes to public men neither honest motive nor private virtue I have no sympathy and no respect. It is a malignant kind of journalism which I can not respect and which all right-minded men must condemn. But that is not the true character of the public press of this country as a whole. The country newspapers, the newspapers that have no special correspondent here, are all against these secret sessions. All over this land without regard to section these country newspapers, which represent the real sentiment of the country, which go where the minister and the schoolmaster and where the voice of the Senate does not otherwise go, have declared in favor of this measure.

The men who publish those newspapers think of our Government, they study public questions a great deal more than we suppose, and the fact that there is but one voice in the press shows where public sentiment is on this subject. Public sentiment compelled open legislative sessions of the Senate, and it now demands open executive sessions of the Senate.

Whence arises this demand? It is not idle curiosity. It is not that a few reporters may look in on these proceedings and send the news to the journals which they represent. Oh, no; that is not it. It is the desire of the people for a better administration of the Government. It is a desire of the people that the standard of official life and character shall be elevated; and they know the only way to do it is by having the qualifications of men discussed openly in the Senate Chamber.

I should like to read extracts from newspapers, but I will content myself with reading one. I read it from a Democratic paper in my own State—a conservative paper, a paper that does not mean to misrepresent Senators or the Senate. It is from the New Haven Register:

"But it is in the confirmatory powers of both the National and State Senates that the evil of the secret-session system most clearly discloses itself. Many an unworthy public official is imposed upon the community by the Senate to please the whim and caprice of 'a brother Senator,' because the responsibility for his confirmation can not be fixed. Whereas if the country only knew what Senators indorsed the nominations of this class of servants, not one of them would dare vote for a confirmation. Moreover, the secret session encourages a disreputable class of politicians to seek public office. They know that whatever their faults are they will not be held up to the contemplation of the country. They are sure to have 'a pull' with either their own or some other fellow's Senator, which a secret session will permit to be worked for all it is worth in bargains and trades. The results are that the responsibility for bad officials is hopelessly divided, and bad officials get into office."

Pardon a single other extract from among thousands. It is from the New York Independent:

"There is no good and sufficient reason why these sessions should be secret, and the action of the Senate should be known to the people only in the result. Secrecy gives an opportunity for bargains between Senators and bargains between the President and Senators in respect to appointments to office that would not exist to anything like the same extent if the sessions were open and the general public permitted to see all that is done. Both the President and the Senate, with open sessions, would act under a sense of responsibility—the one in making nominations and the other in acting upon them—that would be favorable to the best interests of the civil service of the country. Both would be influenced by the fact that the eye of the public is upon them."

These extracts from conservative newspapers show what the sentiment is in regard to the way we conduct business here. I want to say the press in this respect is largely mistaken, but you can not eradicate that idea from the public mind.

But there is another argument, which is also an argument of self-defense. I have said that secrecy begets suspicion. Go to a dinner party, to any social gathering, and see two persons whispering together, and you think they are saying something which they ought not to say, and probably about yourself. Secrecy begets suspicion; and it is only human nature which the public are exemplifying when they believe that something wrong is done behind these doors in the way of bargains and trades and arrangements by which men are confirmed to office.

I say no Senator can afford to expose himself to any such suspicion. Every Senator knows it exists. Every Senator knows that very largely through this country the idea is that we bargain with each other about confirmations, or that we confirm nominees out of good nature, or that through some idea of senatorial courtesy we fail to oppose men whom we ought to oppose or favor men whom we ought not to favor. Every Senator knows it, and I for one do not want to endure it. I do not want it longer to exist. A poet said:

"O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us!"

I wish Senators would try to exercise that gift. I wish they would try to understand how they are regarded in this respect, what the people think of the way in which we conduct business here in the secret sessions of the Senate, and the motives which influence us in the confirmation of persons to office. I agree I am glad to testify that it is a great mistake in the popular mind, but as I said you can not eradicate it. No record for honesty, no record of an honorable life, no record which a man has made of pure motives and pure intentions exempts or excuses himself from this belief on the part of the people. If you doubt it, ride in the cars, in any public vehicle, listen to the conversation along the streets, hear what motives are attributed to Senators who we know are honorable by people in ordinary conversation. If there were no other argument but this in favor of open sessions I should insist upon it that the people might know what my motives were in regard to the confirmation or rejection of men.

But Mr. President, there is no secrecy. We are hugging an old custom for its name rather than for its actual results. We are pinning the Senate to the skirts of an ancient tradition when there are no results to be obtained from it. There is no secrecy possible. There never has been any secrecy possible in any matter about which the public desired information that took place in executive session. I do not say how much or how little, or whether any at all of the reports which we see from day to day in the newspapers published after each executive session is true, but I think I am justified without revealing any secrets of executive session, without doing what the Senator from Vermont intimated was done in his colloquy the other day with the Senator from Kentucky, violating a senatorial oath and becoming guilty of senatorial perjury—I believe I may say that the secrets of this body are to a greater or less degree exposed and disclosed. Mixed they may be with untruth, mixed they may be with the fertile imagination of the newspaper reporter, nevertheless no Senator will deny me in saying that more or less of what occurs in executive session is disclosed.

It is disclosed either by Senators or by the officers of the Senate, and when I say that I do not mean to cast the slightest suspicion upon the officers of the Senate. I do not want to be in a body where I am subjected to the suspicion of dishonorable disclosure. We are a class here, as lawyers, as clergymen, as bank presidents, and as business men are a class; and when one does a thing that is discreditable we all suffer.

I repeat, there is no secrecy possible with regard to the executive sessions as to those matters which the public want to know. Let me refer, as I have referred, to the Jay treaty. I refer to the treaty of Washington. I shall not stop to dwell upon it. I refer to the case of the Spanish treaty. I hold in my hand three pamphlets, International Awards and Arbitrations, by George Ticknor Curtis, a reply by Mr. Foster, and another reply by Mr. Curtis. They all tell the public that there is a treaty pending here, and in what they say of the treaty they give extracts from it, and yet if there is a treaty pending here to-day known as the Weil and La Abra treaty I may not say so, and I may not say one word in relation to it without incurring the degrading punishment of being expelled from the Senate.

Let me quote from the discussion in the Senate in 1862 upon the Wade resolution, to which I have alluded. Mr. Foster, a Senator from my own State, said:

"Mr. President, I am not disposed to oppose the adoption of this joint rule, but I must be permitted to express my great doubts as to our acting in secret with efficiency. I do not believe that secrecy is an element of power in our Government. I believe it is an element of weakness, decidedly. We have at the present time what are facetiously called secret sessions of the Senate; and, sir, what is done in secret session, or what is reported to be done is brought before the eye of the public I think rather earlier and more minutely than what is done in open session. I do not say that it is correctly reported, but it is so reported that the public give it credit; and if it is false, it is more likely to do harm than though the truth were reported. I do not see, therefore, that we gain by attempting to conceal our transactions from the public eye. I am not disposed, however, to enlarge upon that topic. I am perfectly willing to accord with the Senate in passing the rule if it is deemed best to do so." (Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., pt. 1, p. 491.)

Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, said, speaking of a clause providing for expulsion in case of disclosure:

"That is the rule now, sir, for punishing the disclosure of what occurs in the executive sessions of the Senate; and what have we seen since this session began? Why, sir, we have seen published nearly everything that has occurred in executive session; and the rule which the Senator now proposes to adopt to prevent it is no more stringent than the present rule of the Senate. I should hope, if this rule be adopted, that we shall be able to keep our secrets and that the punishment prescribed by the rules would be inflicted upon the violators of them. I wish that punishment could be inflicted upon the violators of the rule during the present session of Congress in this respect. We have hardly had an executive session, certainly not one where there has been any discussion or any question dividing the body, that nearly everything that has transpired has not been published the next day to the world—published with exaggeration, published with misrepresentations, placing Members in a false position. I would infinitely prefer that our regular reporters should be here and publish what we do say and how we act than that these garbled accounts should go out to the public to create bad feeling in the country. I do not know that we have any assurance that this new rule will be better observed than the present rule is; but if it is adopted, I hope it will be.

"I do not mean to oppose the adoption of a rule to go into secret session for the purpose indicated by the chairman of the War Committee. I want to see greater harmony between the different departments of the Government, closer connection between them, each bolstering up the other, and that we may go along hand in hand to put down this rebellion in the shortest possible time. Therefore, reluctant as I am to vote for a resolution imposing secrecy upon ourselves, I shall consent to this if it can be modified so as not to place the body absolutely at the disposal of a single Member." (Congressional Globe, 37th Cong., 2d sess., pt. 1, pp. 491, 492.)

What a farce it is, Mr. President. The whole community, the world, are laughing at us that we pretend to have secret sessions. We ourselves would be infinitely better off if every word that is said here were known to the remotest portion of the globe than with the pretended publications of what we do and say, mixed up with the imagination of reporters and the untruthfulness which accompanies the reports.

There is nothing left to us but silent endurance when we are misrepresented. I could name matters in which to-day my people suppose that I have voted one way because it has been so stated in the newspapers and I voted the other way. I have nothing left to do but to endure and to submit to the misrepresentation, because I can not disclose what my vote was or the motive which led me to give it unless I can get the injunction of secrecy removed; and that goes, as every Senator knows, as a matter of courtesy very often to a particular Senator. The public believes these disclosures.

But there is another reason why we should make the discussion of nominations open, and that is because the discussion of the question whether an officer nominated to the Senate shall be confirmed or not often involves the most critical and important policy of the Government. We have had an instance within the last few days of the discussion as to the right of the President to withhold papers upon the consideration of nominations. It was so important as to be taken out of the secret business of the Senate and made the matter of a public discussion. Why? Because it involved a principle. So almost every nomination here that does not go as a matter of course involves a principle of administration, a policy of administration, a policy of government. Take a few instances.

Take Jay's nomination. Take the removals for political reasons in 1835, when Marcy uttered that famous sentence that "they agree to the rule that to the victors belong the spoils of the enemy." That was in secret session. It arose in secret session upon the question of the confirmation of a nomination. For a knowledge of that important discussion we are indebted to the fact of the removal of the injunction of secrecy in the particular instance, so that Senators might by publication of their speeches let the country know what was said in secret session. They were afterwards written out and published, and thus only we get the information. A great many matters of great public importance have been discussed in secret sessions upon the consideration of nominations that have never gone to the public; the seal of secrecy has never been removed from them. I have heard speeches made in the Senate in secret session which ought to be in every schoolbook in the land, and yet they are sealed by that rule which makes me liable to expulsion if I disclose them.

Without enlarging upon such cases, I instance the nomination of ministers to the Panama Congress, the nomination of directors for the United States Bank, the Kearney nomination, where Mr. Benton, as Senator Hale said in the discussion of this subject in 1853—I suppose he alludes to him—discussed that nomination for three weeks in executive session. It turned upon the policy of the government of the Territory of New Mexico while under a military governor. Take the case of Burnett, now pending; take the case where we confirmed a man nominated to office only a few days ago, the case of Judge Merrick. I ask Senators who were in executive session that day whether it would not be better for this whole people that every word which was said on that occasion should be spread upon the record, whether important principles were not discussed which the people ought to know about.

I have alluded to these instances only to show that except in the cases which go without contradiction, or the very few contested cases which arise upon the record of the candidate, almost all of these nominations involve some important principle of the administration of the Government. What occasion is there for concealment? We hear frequently about the policy of the President. Where is the policy of a President shown more than in the class, the character, the tone of the men whom he nominates for office?

That leads me, Mr. President, to my concluding proposition. The nomination of an Indian commission may involve our whole Indian policy; the nomination of a postmaster may involve the whole policy of civil-service reform; and we never shall have a real, thorough reform of our civil service until the widest possible publicity is given to the methods of presidential nominations and senatorial confirmation. This thing has been going from bad to worse during the hundred years that we have closed up these doors, and the people have become more or less aroused on this subject. They do not believe that the methods of seeking office, of getting office, of making nominations and confirming men to office are calculated to inure to the welfare of this Government, and they want a change. They think they have a right to know by what means men secure nominations and obtain confirmation. They want to know how it is done and why it is done—and they are right.

What is the principle underlying the idea of civil-service reform? I want to say that I believe in that principle. It is that fitness and good character shall be the real primary tests and qualifications for office. Nay, more than that, not only that the man shall be fit and good but that he shall be the fittest and best man obtainable for the office. That is the principle of civil-service reform, and it has no limitations to men who discharge mere clerical duties. It applies to all officers, to the heads of departments, to Senators, to Members of the House, to every man who is nominated by the President, to come before this body for confirmation. The best government is only attainable by the appointment of the fittest and best men. Negative fitness and goodness will not do in this respect. We must have absolute fitness and absolute goodness in the character of our officers or the whole system of republican institutions is in danger.

What was the abuse which has aroused the people in this respect? The abuse was that offices were bestowed as rewards for political service, or adherence to the fortunes of men who could manage appointments; that patronage controlled appointments. That is the reason why men have become earnest in this matter of civil-service reform. How was that carried on? It was carried on by the solicitation of politicians to the appointing power, by recommendations from politicians to the appointing power, by nominations secured by such solicitations, persistent solicitations by politicians, by Senators and Representatives who should act only in a legislative capacity. That was the way it was possible; solicitation privately made, patronage privately dispensed, confirmations secretly accomplished. These are the things which have aroused the people, and Senators know that I speak the truth when I say it.

Has it ceased, Mr. President? In this discussion I exclude the question whether officers should be changed when a political administration is changed. Admit that or deny it, the reason for open executive sessions is still the same. If the officeholders are to be taken from one political party because that party is in power, you still want to get the best and the fittest men in that party, and it is only thus that you can secure the best government by that party.

It is a mockery to speak of civil-service reform as accomplished because 13,000 or 14,000 mere clerks are appointed by competitive examinations and are not liable to be discharged on the change of an administration. We confirm 4,000 men in the Senate, not including military and naval officers, any one of whom has ten, twenty, nay, fifty times the political influence of any clerk who is appointed under the civil-service rules, and how are these men appointed? Go stand on the steps of the White House; see who goes there. Go stand within the library of the President; see how he is persistently approached and solicited to appoint men to office.

I wish to put in a table, which I have obtained as approximately correct from one of the civil service commissioners, showing the number of persons whom we confirm here to political offices:

Memorandum of officers whose appointment is by nomination and confirmation

Department of State:
Department officers	3
Consular and Diplomatic Service (about)	800
		803
Treasury Department:
Department officers	33
Collectors of internal revenue	85
Officers of customs	200
Mint officers	26
Supervising inspectors of steam vessels	10
Assistant treasurers	9
		363

Interior Department:
Department officers	21
Surveyors general	17
Receivers of land offices	109
Registers of land offices	109
Indian inspectors	5
Indian agents	61
Pension agents	18
Territorial governors, 9; Territoral secretaries, 9	18
Utah commissioners	6
		364
Post Office Department:
Department officers	4
Postmasters	2,248
		2,252
Department of Justice:
Department officers	8
Supreme Court justices	9
Court of Claims justices	5
Justices Supreme Court of District of Columbia	6
Circuit court judges	12
District judges	54
District attorneys	69
Marshals	69
Territorial judges	29
		261
Whole number requiring confirmation		4,043

Whole number of civil employees, about 110,000; of these, 52,632 are postmasters. Places subject to civil-service examination, about 15,000, namely, departments at Washington, 6,000; postal, 6,000; customs, 3,000.

Is it possible for a President, no matter how good his intention, how strong his desire may be, to select for officers the best and most capable men even from the ranks of his own party until the present methods are done away with?

Until there shall be some degree of publicity attending the procuring of nominations, until the President shall be in some degree relieved from the solicitations to which he is subjected, until we speak openly in regard to the character of men who get nominations and the official standard of the service to which such men are appointed, this thing will go on. It is a farce and a mockery and a delusion to talk about civil-service reform as an accomplished fact while this goes on.

There is no party consideration in this; either party will be advantaged and neither party can be hurt by the adoption of this resolution. Is patronage no longer known? Can President Cleveland select the best qualified men while the country knows that recommendations are to be hidden and confirmations are to be surrounded by secrecy?

How, then, is civil service to achieve its ultimate triumph? One road and one road only leads to the goal of its perfect success. That road passes through those open doors. Give to the people every opportunity to scrutinize the means, the influence, by which men obtain nominations to office, the causes for which incumbents are removed, the methods by which confirmations or rejections are secured.

While the Senate holds the President to his promised transaction of the business of selection of officials behind glass doors, let it, in the language of Senator Sumner, imitate the example of "the ancient Roman who bade his architect so construct his house that his guests and all that he did could be seen by the world." Then the whole scene will be changed; the man whose character can not stand public scrutiny either at the Executive Mansion or in the Senate Chamber will no longer be a candidate for appointment, or if a candidate he will be an unsucessful one—offices will then in truth begin to seek the man, for it will be useless for the man to unduly seek the office. Office holding will, as it should in a free government, become honorable and honored.

Bestow the offices as publicly as possible. Let all the people know why and how they are bestowed, and they will see to it that the standard of official life is raised to its highest plane. Still surround the bestowal of office with concealment, with mystery, with secrecy, and the standard of official life will inevitably sink to its lowest level.

Mr. President, this Senate Chamber, constructed as it is to exclude the joyous sunlight and the pure air of heaven, is the most fitting place in which to conduct this business of secretly considering nominations to office. Here the sunlight never enters; here we may never breathe the pure air of heaven; here we languish and sicken and eventually die; here every vital physical and mental energy is impaired if not paralyzed. While we remain we must live in a dungeon.

This Chamber is an architectural failure—I had almost said an architectural outrage; but it has its fair complement in the way we conduct the business here regarding nominations. That conduct is a political failure; it is fast coming to be a political outrage. We can not change the construction of this Chamber, but we can change our method of doing our executive business. Do we wish to restore our political health? Do we desire a new lease of political and beneficent life? Then these doors must be opened. We must let in the light; the "keen, bright sunlight of publicity must illumine our transactions; we must breathe in the pure and vitalizing atmosphere of popular responsibility."

PROPOSED SALE OF UNITED STATES LINES (S. DOC. NO. 218)

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the Shipping Board relative to the sale of the United States Lines be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, submitting in response to Senate Resolution 317, of January 29, 1929, a report relative to the proposed sale of the United States Lines, and stating, in part, "Inasmuch as the American Merchant Lines combination passenger and cargo vessels are included in the offers for sale and are covered by the bid under consideration herein, the board has included information on the American Merchant Lines as well as the United States Lines."

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the report may be referred to the Committee on Commerce and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT COOLIDGE AT MOUNTAIN LAKE, FLA.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, on yesterday at Mountain Lake, Fla., upon the occasion of the dedication of the Bok carillon singing tower, President Coolidge made a most excellent address and one full of interest. I think it would be very proper to have it inserted in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF PRESIDENT COOLIDGE AT MOUNTAIN LAKE, FLA.

Our country is giving an increasing amount of attention to art. We have reached a time when our people have more leisure for enjoyment and more means for gratifying their taste. Even during its colonial history it was not without some progress in this direction. Very early it produced painters of historic merit. Some of the architecture of the eighteenth century continues to hold a very high place, but with the exception of a few public buildings, these creations were for private use and reached but a few people.

While the United States has been by no means lacking in spiritual vision, and, considering the circumstances of its surroundings, has been remarkable in the devotion of its religious life, yet, being new and undeveloped, it has been necessary for our people first of all to give their attention to the material side of existence. We have been forced to get things done. We have been required to build cities, improve harbors, open mines, cut down forests, lay out great systems of transportation, till the soil, erect factories, open banks, and develop commerce. We have been making a new Nation out of raw materials. What others have done in many centuries we have crowded into the short space of 300 years. It is only in the last generation that the great body of our people have been sufficiently relieved from the pressing necessities of existence so that they could give some thought to the art of living.

It is significant of our institutions and of the spirit of our national life that in the opening up of the new era we have attempted to give to the people at large what in other days had been enjoyed only by a fortunate and privileged few. This effort began with popular education. The free public school, the endowed academy and college, the high school, and the State university were the beginnings of this movement. They have more recently been supplemented by public art galleries, popular concerts for the presentation of the best music, and the opening of innumerable public parks. The useful and the practical are being supplemented by the artistic and the beautiful.

This has been done in no small and niggardly way, but on a vast scale representing an outlay of many hundred millions of dollars.

Many people have given large sums to these purposes, and municipal, State, and national resources have been employed in ever-increasing amounts.

It would be a mistake to suppose that the organization of the material side of existence has been completed. It is more likely that it has only just begun. But it has progressed far enough so that a moderate amount of industry and thrift is all that is needed to relieve the great mass of our people from the pinch of poverty, and when these are supplemented with such training and skill as it is possible for almost anyone to acquire, to raise them to a position of comparative affluence. Above this line there are an increasing number of individuals who have sufficient resources to enable them to minister in a most substantial way to the humanitarian and artistic side of life. Some of the largest fortunes which were ever accumulated in the United States have been almost entirely devoted to such charities.

We can not observe this movement without smiling a little at those who but a short time ago expressed so much fear lest our country might come under the control of a few individuals of great wealth. They claimed that the rich were growing richer and the poor were growing poorer. Our experience has demonstrated that the reverse of this would be much nearer the truth. So many of our people have large amounts of property that it has taken on the aspect of being common. The distinction that it once carried is gone. It is also doubtful if there ever was a time when even great wealth gave its possessors so little power as at present. Their money is of very little value in determining political action. Capital is so easily secured for any promising enterprise that it is no longer necessary to be rich to go into business, even on an extensive scale. The possession of money has never been sufficient to gain the social attentions of persons of culture and refinement.

On the other hand, the advantages that are enjoyed by people of moderate means, including the great mass of wage earners, were never so great as they are at present. Not only is their income proportionately greater than ever before, but their whole method of life, their opportunities to secure benefits which but a short time ago were the exclusive possession of the rich, have been tremendously increased. I have already referred to the broadening field of education. Another new element is the wide use of the automobile. Whole families are able to have the beneficial results of travel at an outlay which is so small that it is practically within the reach of everyone. Within the last few years the radio has come to afford entertainment and instruction to a great body of our people. Through these instrumentalities the vision has been extended to embrace the wide circle of our rich scenery, and the hearing has been amplified so that it may listen to the eloquence and music of many distant places. Through the medium of the motion picture all that is attractive and instructive in the art of acting and the presentation of scenery is to be had at a very moderate cost. All of this has greatly enriched the life of those who were recently looked upon as poor.

These grounds which we are dedicating to-day are another extension of this rapidly developing movement. It has been designated as a sanctuary because within it people may temporarily escape from the pressure and affliction of the affairs of life and find that quiet and repose which comes from a closer communion with the beauties of nature. We have not secured the benefits which I have enumerated without being obliged to pay a price. The multiplicity and the swiftness of the events with which we are surrounded exhaust our nervous energy. The constant impact upon us of great throngs of people of itself produces a deadening fatigue. We have a special need for a sanctuary like this to which we can retreat for a time from the daily turmoil and have a place to rest and think under the quieting influence of nature and of nature's God.

It is not only through action but through contemplation that people come to understand themselves. Man does not live by bread alone. This thought is expressed in the motto of the sanctuary in the words of John Burroughs: "I come here to find myself. It is so easy to get lost in the world." We are so thickly crowded with the forest of events that there is not only danger that we can not see the trees, but that we may lose our sense of direction. Under the influence of these beautiful surroundings we can pause unhampered while we find out where we are and whither we are going. Those who come here report the feeling of peace which they have experienced. In the expression of an ancient writer, it is a place to which to invite one's soul, where one may see in the landscape and foliage not what man has done but what God has done.

The main purpose of this sanctuary and tower is to preach the gospel of beauty. Although they have been made possible through the generosity of Mr. Edward W. Bok, he does not wish them to be considered as a memorial or a monument. While it has been his purpose to give some expression here to his own love of the beautiful, in form, in color, and in sound, he has also sought to preserve the quiet majesty of the trees, increase the display of coloring in the flowers, and combine stone and marble in the graceful lines of the tower, all in a setting surrounded by green foliage and reflected in sparkling waters over which the song of the nightingale will mingle with the music of the bells.

As the tourist and the traveler in search of recreation and a change from the more rigorous climate of the North come to this wonderful State of perpetual springtime and summer, they can pause and think how much our country can profit by cultivating an appreciation and understanding of the beautiful in nature and in art as they are here combined. The material prosperity of our Nation will be of little avail unless it is translated into a spiritual prosperity. We need a deeper realization of the value and power of beauty. While few have the means to present such a gorgeous display as will here strike the eye and the ear, it is well to remember that beauty is not dependent upon large areas or great heights. Some of the most appealing and fascinating homes in the world are small. They may represent but little outlay and be the abode of people of moderate means, but if there dwells a fine character within it will shine forth and give to all the surroundings a touch of peace and loveliness which the most spacious palace can not surpass.

Wherever communities are formed there is ample opportunity for this kind of expression. Those who visit here can not escape taking away with them an inspiration for better things. They will be filled with a noble discontent which can not fail to react in some degree against all forms of physical and spiritual ugliness. They will go forth as missionaries of the beautiful because of what they have seen and heard. The streets of distant towns will be cleaner. Lawns will be better kept. A larger number of trees will spread their verdant shade over highways and homes. Public buildings will take on more beautiful lines, making life more graceful and more complete. Certainly, we need to put more emphasis on improvements of such a nature.

The influence of an example like this is always contagious. The noticeable improvement of architecture in this country had its inception in the exhibition of the fine buildings of the World's Fair at Chicago. The five years following the fair at San Francisco changed the whole face of the State of California. This combination of influences has resulted in the recent enactments of Congress to span the Potomac with a memorial bridge and adorn the avenues of the Capital City with stately public buildings. Already there is a very healthy and beneficial competition in this field among various cities of the United States. Civic centers are being laid out with spacious squares surrounded by public buildings which will reflect the power and dignity of the beautiful in community life.

This sanctuary and tower are not only endowed with a beauty of their own, but they are a representation of the beneficent spirit of the giver. They are another illustration that the men of wealth of the United States are not bent on the accumulation of money merely for its own sake, or that they may use it in selfish and ostentatious display. A most cursory examination of the facts would soon disclose that our country leads the world in its charities and endowments. It would be difficult to recall any line of endeavor capable of ministering to human welfare, not only in our own country but in many places abroad, which is not being helped by the generosity of our people of wealth. Not only that, but the charities of this Nation stand on a plane which is occupied by them alone. They have never been tainted with any effort to hold back the rising tide of a demand for the abolition of privilege and the establishment of equality, but have rather been the result of a sincere philanthropy. They have not come from any class consciousness; certainly, not from any class fear. They represent in all its beauty and purity the love of man and the desire to benefit the human race. We have a strong sense of trusteeship. While giving every credit to the genius of management and holding strongly to the right of individual possessions, we realize that to a considerable extent wealth is the creation of the people, and it is fitting, as in this case, that it should be expended for their material, intellectual, and moral development.

While there is much to be said for the statement that there is nothing new in the world, there are yet many things that are new in our country. In the Netherlands, Belgium, France, and England the carillon has been in existence for hundreds of years. It goes back to the fourteenth century. In the Netherlands, which supplied the inspiration for this singing tower, a community that does not have a carillon is not regarded as complete. While in the United States we have always been accustomed to the bells of the churches, and later to their use in transportation and industry, yet the carillon has been very little appreciated. Only a few have been built. This singing tower only brings our entire number up to 30. It will take its place, therefore, of giving our people what is to them a comparatively new form of music, as they have the pleasure of listening to its melodious cadence. It contains 61 bells and is the largest and heaviest ever cast in a single order. So intricate is the task of turning them out perfectly tuned and in complete harmony that their construction has taken nearly a year. The people of this locality have already been listening to them, and in the future the beauty of their song will impress itself upon the endless line of coming generations. As they gaze upon the structure which holds them and are moved by their music, it will all blend in one harmonious whole; and more and more they will realize the significance of the designation given to such structures by the Dutch of "singing tower."

This wonderful work with all its loveliness of form, of color, and of sound, is another evidence of the breadth and completeness of the life of our Republic. We should find, if we sought for it, a considerable literature undertaking to prove the necessity of a ruling class for national political well-being and the need of a privileged nobility as the best method of providing for the cultural and artistic life of a people. It is not to be denied that under such a system, when tempered with a wholesome regard for liberty under the law, there has been great progress. But in many respects it is of a narrow and limited nature. The brilliance at the top of the social structure has always been insufficient to furnish light for the great mass of the people. When we erected our institutions on the basic theory of equality our ability under such conditions to produce the finer things of life was immediately challenged. The correctness of our theory has been more and more demonstrated by the course of events. We have been able to raise up individuals who stand out in history undimmed by any comparisons to which they can be subjected. Our artistic growth has been constant and in its individual examples and its general application is not excelled by any other people. In its main purpose to create a nation and increase intelligence, stability, and character our Republic has met with unexampled success. It has been thoroughly demonstrated that the principle of equality is sound. Our institutions have endowed our people with insight and vision. The individual has been developed, the Nation has become great. The belief that there is nothing which our people can not do, and no power which our people ought not to have, has been the main source of our progress. Faith in our people stands vindicated beyond further discussion. Into their hands we have entirely intrusted the future destiny of our Nation.

It is a trait of human nature to wish to personify its ideals. This is the chief reason that the kingly office continued to exist after it had served its main purpose of being sufficiently skilled in military leadership so as to increase the order and security of the country. The people found it easier to have their conception of sovereignty embodied in a personality. The monarch reflected the greatness which came from them. It was very seldom that he created it. It was much easier under those circumstances to secure a response when calling on the people to make sacrifices for the national welfare. They felt they were doing it for the king. They could see him in person and hear his expression of approbation. For his glorification not only were men willing to take up arms, but they found in him an inspiration for their art. Their music, their literature, their sculpture, and their painting dealt with royal subjects. Even Shakespeare gave royal titles to a number of his productions.

In the course of long human experience actions of this nature are not accidental. If they did not serve some useful purpose in the development of the race, either they would not have occurred at all or would have been of a transitory nature. They persisted because they gave the people a better conception of the abstract idea of national unity and national sovereignty. Even when our own Constitution was adopted this idea was so firmly intrenched that it was with great difficulty and hesitation that the people of that period were able to cast aside the idea of a personal sovereignty. That they did so stamped their action as extremely revolutionary. But finally our Nation and our States have planted themselves squarely and securely on the theory that all the powers of government emanate from the people. They stand as our sovereign. They are our national monarch. That act was a recognition of their own inalienable nobility.

Gradually, for complete revolutions do not occur in a day, we have transferred our allegiance to the people. It is for them that our songs are made, our books are published, our pictures are painted, our public squares are adorned, our park systems are developed, and the art of the stage and the screen is created. While these things are done by individuals, this movement is "of the people, by the people, and for the people." It is no accident that this superb creation which we are dedicating to-day is the conception of a man whose only heritage was that of good breeding, an American by adoption, not by birth, who has felt the pinch of poverty, who has experienced the thrill of hard manual labor, and who has triumphed over many difficulties.

Edward W. Bok is making this contribution in recognition of his loyalty to his sovereign—the people. It is another demonstration that when they are given the opportunity the people have the innate power to provide themselves with the wealth, the culture, the art, and the refinements that support an enlightened civilization.

Now, therefore, in a spirit of thankfulness for the success of our institutions, which is here attested, and appreciation of the munificent generosity which is here exhibited, in my capacity as President of the United States I hereby dedicate this Mountain Lake Sanctuary and its Singing Tower and present them for visitation to the American people.

ST. PAUL FEDERAL LAND BANK

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article from the St. Paul Pioneer Press of Tuesday, January 22, 1929, relative to the St. Paul Federal Land Bank.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

[From the St. Paul Pioneer Press, St. Paul, Minn., Tuesday, January 22, 1929]

PAUL A. PREUS AND OFSTHUN INDICTED HERE—FORMER OFFICIALS OF LAND BANK ACCUSED OF $50,000 PLOT—BOND FIXED AT $10,000—FORMER GOVERNOR'S KIN ARRAIGNED BEFORE UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE SANBORN

Paul A. Preus and Thomas O. Ofsthun, former high officials of the St. Paul Federal land bank, were disclosed Monday as having been indicted on conspiracy charges when Mr. Preus, a brother of former Gov. J. A. O. Preus, surrendered to the United States marshal here.

Mr. Ofsthun will surrender, his attorney announced. Both were indicted secretly Saturday on charges of conspiring to misappropriate more than $50,000 of the bank's funds in land deals approximating $1,000,000. The indictment brings the number of officials charged with criminal activities to four.

Preus, former treasurer of the land bank, was arraigned before United States District Judge John B. Sanborn immediately following his surrender. He pleaded not guilty and the $10,000 bond was set by the court.

BONDS FIXED AT $10,000

Mr. Preus resigned as treasurer of the Federal land bank in July, 1926. Mr. Ofsthun resigned as assistant treasurer in April, 1923. He no longer was connected with the institution when the alleged defalcations took place, but served as secretary of the State rural credits commission.

Preus appeared with Harry Weiss, his attorney, at the office of L. L. Drill, United States district attorney, and was taken before Federal Judge John B. Sanborn for arraignment. He pleaded not guilty to the charges and his bond was set at $10,000 which was furnished.

Mr. Weiss announced that he also is attorney for Ofsthun and that the latter, who is out of the city, will appear and give himself up, probably Tuesday. Preus and Ofsthun have been associated in business in Cleveland since investigation of the bank's affairs began more than a year ago. Their families live in St. Paul.

CARRIES 2-YEAR TERM

Penalty for conviction on the charges against Preus and Ofsthun is two years in Leavenworth Penitentiary or a fine of $10,000, or both.

Through his attorney, Mr. Preus authorized the following statement after his arraignment:

"We have not had the opportunity to learn the details of the charges against Mr. Preus, and until we do so we will be unable to make a definite statement. But any transactions in which he was involved were approved by the board of directors of the Federal land bank.

"When all the facts are brought out, these transactions will be found to be in the best interests of the bank. And when all the facts are brought out it will be found that Mr. Preus can fully account for any money involved in transactions in which he was concerned at the bank."

CLOSES LONG INQUIRY

The indictment and surrender culminated one of the most far-reaching and startling investigations ever conducted by the Federal Government here. James A. Wharton, assistant United States district attorney, was in charge of the investigation.

H. J. Speeter, also a former assistant treasurer of the bank, and John E. Martin, former general counsel, were indicted by a Federal grand jury here last spring on charges of defrauding the institution of approximately $5,000. They are awaiting trial.

Administration of the land bank's affairs by its present officials is in no way connected with the investigation or the indictments against the former officials, and H. K. Jennings, former president, also is said to have been cleared of blame.

The indictment naming Preus and Ofsthun reveals an intricate system of alleged misappropriation and accuses them of 11 overt acts, through which they are alleged to have carried out the conspiracy. In the alleged overt acts they are charged with misappropriating, between September 9, 1925, and May 8, 1926, the sums of $1,235.35, $11,853.55, $2,274, and $37,447.60, totaling $52,828.50.

The history of their alleged operations was made public at the office of the United States district attorney.

FORECLOSURE DEALS CITED

Preus became treasurer of the St. Paul Federal land bank in December, 1917. Ofsthun's connection with the bank began the same year, but he was not appointed assistant to Mr. Preus until 1918. As assistant treasurer Ofsthun became familiar with the fact that the bank sells farms it obtains under foreclosure.

In 1922 Ofsthun became heavily indebted to Preus through the failure of the Hingham State bank they had reorganized at Hingham, Mont. When Ofsthun resigned as assistant treasurer of the Federal land bank here in 1923 he was appointed secretary of the Minnesota Rural Credits Bureau.

He continued as secretary of the credits bureau until July 1, 1925. Shortly after that he asked Preus to obtain a position for him at the land bank. Preus told him that none was open at the time. At this meeting, however, according to Government investigators, Preus assured Ofsthun that he would be "taken care of," whether or not there was a position open at the bank.

OFFERED TO BUY FARMS

In August, 1925, Ofsthun offered to purchase from the bank for $250,000, 94 North Dakota farms it had obtained under foreclosure. With his offer he inclosed a $15,000 check as part payment. The offer was accepted, after which Ofsthun immediately assigned his interest in the farms to E. W. Backus, millionaire Minnesota lumberman.

Meanwhile the Investment Land Corporation had been formed by Backus and Frank Thompson, widely known St. Paul politician. Ofsthun was made secretary of the corporation, and Backus's interest in 91 of the 94 farms was assigned to the corporation.

Ofsthun appraised the land for the Investment Land Corporation and was paid for his services by that company. In September, 1925, he presented a bill of $1,253.35 to the land bank for the same services. The bill was approved and paid by Preus as treasurer of the bank.

The same month back rentals on the farms totaling nearly $23,000 were paid to the bank. In the purchase contract between the bank and the Investment Land Corporation no mention was made that a portion of this sum be paid the corporation. The indictment charges, however, that $11,853.55 of this sum was paid by the bank to Ofsthun at the direction of Preus.

Several foreclosed farms then were sold by the bank through sources other than the land corporation, although Ofsthun was paid $2,274 by the bank as commission for selling them.

Early in 1926 the Midwest Farms Corporation was formed by the Backus-Thompson interests to purchase more foreclosed farms from the bank. Ofsthun, already secretary of the Investment Land Corporation, also became an employee of the new company.

In February, 1926, Ofsthun offered the bank $250,000 for 106 foreclosed farms. Soon after this the Midwest Farms Corporation offered the bank $275,000 for the same farms and the offer was accepted. Ofsthun then informed Preus that he (Ofsthun) was entitled to $25,000 as commission on the deal.

This transaction was followed by the sale by the bank of 24,000 acres of foreclosed land, valued at several hundred thousand dollars. Ofsthun then presented a bill to the bank of $12,447.60 in commission he asserted he was entitled to in the sale of the 24,000 acres.

Preus allowed both the $25,000 and $12,447.60 bills and sent Ofsthun a check for $37,447.60, according to the indictments. Ofsthun was out of the city when he received the check. He immediately sent the check to a St. Paul bank with instructions that Government bonds be purchased for the amount. On May 28, 1926, the day Ofsthun received his receipt for the bonds, Preus obtained a safety deposit box in a St. Paul bank. Ofsthun had a safety deposit box in another St. Paul bank, but was deputized to open Preus's box.

PAID $37,447.60 ON TWO DEALS

Shortly after this the Midwest Farms Corporation learned that Ofsthun had been paid $37,447.60 as commission on the two deals and that he had invested the sum in bonds. The corporation alleged that it was entitled to this commission and Thompson demanded the bonds from Ofsthun.

Thompson and Ofsthun then went to Ofsthun's deposit box and took from it a sealed package. A few minutes later they obtained a similar package from Preus's box. The packages were placed in Thompson's possession.

Reports of illegal transactions in the land bank here reached the Federal Farm Loan Board at Washington. Early in 1928 two bank examiners for the board informed Assistant District Attorney Wharton that they had disclosed evidence of fraud at the institution.

Mr. Wharton then took charge of the investigation and at his request Department of Justice operatives and Government accountants were assigned to the case. Mr. Wharton and Mr. Drill had numerous conferences on the matter with the Farm Loan Board and with Attorney General Sargent in Washington.

Assistant Attorney General O. H. Luhring and two special assistants to Attorney General Sargent assisted Mr. Wharton in presenting the case to the grand jury here last week. The special assistants were Oliver E. Pagan and William F. Stern, nationally known indictment experts.

Presentation of the case began Tuesday and ended Thursday. Witnesses who testified before the body included Mr. Backus, Mr. Thompson, and Miss Myrtle Cunio, of Cleveland, former private secretary to Mr. Preus.

Mr. Wharton gained national recognition in 1927 when he obtained indictments of six former officials of the Southern Minnesota Joint Stock and Land Bank of Redwood Falls.

INTERPRETATION OF MULTILATERAL TREATIES

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have asked the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to yield to me for a moment to read into the RECORD a statement from the American Journal of International Law with reference to the interpretation of multilateral treaties. There was much discussion during the debate on the multilateral treaty as to the correct interpretation of treaties and as to the effect of the notes upon the part of Great Britain, France, and other countries upon the treaty.

This is an article by Quincy Wright, one of the board of editors of the American Journal of International Law. I think there are several paragraphs which the Senate would be glad to have in the RECORD. In the first place, he says that with reference to bilateral treaties a different rule obtains touching the construction of the same and the effect of notes upon the construction than to a multilateral treaty, and then he says:

With respect to multilateral law-making treaties, however, it is not common to utilize preliminary materials except in so far as incorporated in reservations formally attached to the instrument on signature or ratification and accepted by the other parties to the convention. During the World War the French prize court even refused to accept the report of the drafting committee as a conclusive interpretation of the declaration of London. "The clear and precise provisions of an article which the state had adopted, though the declaration itself had not been ratified, could not be weakened by any extraneous document." In the Tunis nationality decrees case the Permanent Court of International Justice paid no attention to peace-conference discussion introduced by France in support of a particular interpretation of paragraph 8, article 15, of the League of Nations covenant. Instead, the paragraph was interpreted by textual analysis and general principles of law. The same was true with respect to the Rumanian effort to interpret the definitive statute of the Danube by preliminary material. The court recalled "that preparatory words should not be used for the purpose of changing the plain meaning of the text," and refused to consider confidential preparatory material at all. The league council has expressly ruled that reservations to multilateral treaties must be made at signature and can not be attached to accessions. The International Labor Office has similarly ruled that labor conventions resulting, as they do, from a process assuring proper consideration of the interests not only of states but of industrial classes, must be considered as ne varietur documents. Multilateral treaties have sometimes by their own terms prohibited reservations or permitted them only for specified articles. The misunderstandings which would result from reservations or interpretations of such treaties, made in any but the most formal manner and with full opportunity for consideration by the ratifying authority in all the states, has been fully appreciated.

Thus, with respect to interpretation it seems both reasonable and in accord with practice to regard treaties between two or a small number of states as analogous to contracts, while multilateral law-making treaties bear more resemblance to statutes. The latter analogy seems especially applicable to multilateral treaties open to general accession, since the acceding states are usually officially cognizant only of the text and formal reservations and can not be supposed to have accepted interpretations suggested in the preliminary conversations of the original negotiators.

The Kellogg pact is not in precisely this class, because even the acceding powers have, though rather informally, been apprised of the preliminary correspondence. Thus it can not be said that the interpretative notes are without weight. The manner of their presentation and the express or tacit acceptance of most of them by the original signatories precludes such a conclusion. It is believed, however, that they are to be treated merely as evidence of the sense of the text and not as modifications of or exceptions from it, or even as conclusive interpretations.

Preliminary correspondence in regard to a draft treaty may attempt to modify the obligations of all the parties, modify the obligations of particular parties, or interpret the text. The first and second can, it is believed, be done, at least in the case of a multilateral treaty, only by a formal amendment or reservation accepted by all the parties, and if the notes do not acquire that status, they have no effect upon the text which has received formal ratification. Notes purporting merely to interpret the text may, of course, be formally accepted as reservations, in which case they are as binding as the text. They are, in fact, "authentic" interpretations. If they do not acquire this status, their importance depends on the character of the negotiation. In the case of bilateral treaties, such notes, if accepted or not protested by either party, have been regarded as authoritative. They indicate the meaning intended by the parties. In the case of multilateral treaties, however, there is a strong presumption that the terms of the text have the established meaning recognized throughout the family of nations. Such notes may furnish evidence of that meaning, but they are not conclusive of it.

In the present case it does not appear that any of the notes were intended either to amend the text or to give a privileged position to any of the parties. The only one suggesting such an intent is that in which Great Britain calls attention to:

"Certain regions of the world, the welfare and integrity of which constitute a special and vital interest for our peace and safety. His Majesty's Government have been at pains to make it clear in the past that interference with these regions can not be suffered. Their protection against attack is to the British Empire a measure of self-defense. It must be clearly understood that His Majesty's Government in Great Britain accept the new treaty upon the distinct understanding that it does not prejudice their freedom of action in this respect. The Government of the United States have comparable interests, any disregard of which by a foreign power they have declared that they would regard as an unfriendly act. His Majesty's Government believed, therefore, that in defining their position they are expressing the intention and meaning of the United States Government."

Though this may seem to assert a special privilege for Great Britain and the United States, it can readily be read as an interpretation (reasonable in the light of article 21 of the league covenant) that action in pursuit of any internationally recognized "regional understandings" is not within the prohibition of the treaty. The gist of the other notes was summed up in Secretary Kellogg's address to the American Society of International Law on April 28, 1928, as simply the application of established international law to the text of the treaty, and the address was sent to the powers on June 23, 1928, with the invitation to sign.

Thus, while it is believed the importance of the notes lie in the evidence they give of the interpretation which international law would accord to the text, in the opinion of the writer little exception can be taken to their interpretation. It would seem that use of force in self-defense, in pursuance of internationally recognized regional understandings, in fulfillment of guarantees recognized by treaty, or against a state which has itself resorted to war in violation of the pact, is not a resort to war "for the settlement of international controversies" or "as an instrument of national policy." (From the January, 1929, issue of the American Journal of International Law; by Quincy Wright, of the board of editors, pp. 103–106.)

Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. BINGHAM, and Mr. WALSH of Montana addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to ask the Senator to yield for a question to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the Senator from Idaho agree with the interpretation and the conclusions of the writer?

Mr. BORAH. No; not in detail, but I do agree that a different rule applies to multilateral treaties than applies to bilateral treaties. I go further than the author as to the ineffectiveness of the notes.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I was not here when the Senator began reading. Who was the writer?

Mr. BORAH. Quincy Wright.

Mr. MOSES. Having heard from Mr. Quincy Wright in full, I suppose when the treaty comes up for interpretation we will hear from others.

Mr. BORAH. Very likely, and undoubtedly of great authority.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield now to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was merely going to ask a similar question.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am not fully advised, so I inquire, who is Mr. Quincy Wright?

Mr. BORAH. He is one of the editors of the Journal of International Law.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that certain resolutions and communications which I now present from various associations and societies in favor of the passage of the cruiser construction bill may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table. There are about 10 of them.

There being no objection, the communications and resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The following resolution was unanimously passed at the fourth annual Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, held in Memorial Continental Hall, Washington, D. C., at which 38 patriotic organizations were represented by 684 delegates:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense, consisting of 38 patriotic organizations in convention assembled, that we unqualifiedly support the program for naval defense, namely, fifteen 10,000-ton cruisers and one airplane carrier, same to be laid down in a 3-year time limit (1931), and that we demand its immediate adoption."

NEW YORK, N. Y., January 29, 1929.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The National Association of Manufacturers and National Industrial Council, representing thousands of industrialists in every State of the Union, has the largest investment in permanent peace, but we realize that adequate protection for our expanding commerce and respect for our position in the world demand reasonable naval defense. Without it, we can not feel secure. Our utter lack of preparedness cost our taxpayers in the last war, according to the estimates of the President of the United States, $170,000,000 a day. We urge, in the name of reasonable security, immediate passage of the naval bill which you are presenting with such admirable skill. In this statement I express the assured sentiment of the great body of American manufacturers. The goal is peace, but we realize the practical necessity for adequate protection.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
Chairman Senate Committee on Naval Affairs,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HALE: The bill now pending in Congress for the construction of fifteen 10,000-ton cruisers has aroused the deepest interest in the minds of the masters and licensed deck officers of American merchant ships.

The lessons of the past are still fresh in their memory. They know from actual experience what happens to the merchant ships of a neutral nation when any of the great maritime powers are at war with each other. It would seem that having surrendered superiority in battleships, gained at an enormous cost, we ought not to be asked to accept an inferior position in cruiser tonnage, thus placing our ocean-borne commerce at the mercy of any nation possessing greater sea power than our own.

No sane person, be he landsman or sailor man, desires to see war, with all its attendant losses and horrors, but rather do we believe that the best guaranty of peace is to be found in the ability to protect ourselves from unjust aggression at sea through unlawful seizure of our merchant ships by European belligerents.

It is the unanimous opinion of the members of our association that the enactment of this bill will tend to promote peace rather than to provoke war.

Senator FREDERICK HALE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, with a membership of more than 26,000 officers, and which is the representative organization of the 115,000 reserve officers of the Army of the United States, is deeply interested in all matters pertaining to the defense of this Nation. We are, therefore, vitally concerned about the enactment into law at this session of Congress of the cruiser bill, providing for 15 additional cruisers for our Navy. We have given careful study to the subject of our Navy's needs and are familiar with the terms and at least some of the results of the disarmament conference held at Washington. We are so thoroughly convinced as an association that this bill should be speedily enacted into law we have made it, upon our own initiation, a major consideration in our legislative program for this session of Congress.

I am confident I express the practically unanimous sentiment of the Organized Reserves, which in time of war constitutes about 85 per cent of our entire land forces, when I say that the passage of the cruiser bill is of the greatest importance to an adequate national defense and the future welfare of this country. Permit me, therefore, to urge you, and through you the Senate of the United States, to cause the passage of this important legislation without unnecessary delay.

The land forces of the country must have the cooperation of an adequate naval force in time of emergency. Therefore naval inferiority weakens the entire defense scheme to the success of which this association is dedicated.

Sincerely yours,

ROY HOFFMAN, President.

THE DISABLED AMERICAN VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR, LEGISLATIVE AND REHABILITATION DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1928.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
Chairman Naval Affairs Committee, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HALE: On the eve of the consideration of this matter of supreme importance to the American national defense, I desire to record the vigorous support of the Disabled American Veterans to the naval construction bill.

Composed exclusively of men who still carry the disabilities of their World War service, we feel that the Disabled American Veterans are particularly qualified to speak with authority on the necessity of proper preparedness.

The organized disabled men of this country are unitedly behind the Kellogg pact as a movement toward lessening the chances of war, but we see no inconsistency in the maintenance of proper protection at sea merely because we are cooperating in the hope of removing the probability of further armed conflict.

Upon the construction of a modern fireproof building one of the first actions taken by the owners is to sign policies covering fire insurance, and the Disabled American Veterans feel that proper preparedness under our Constitution no more invites war than insurance invites fire.

Well-meaning but misled groups, under the skillful leadership of those who would dull the national conscience by their false heresies of internationalism, are prepared to Chinafy this country by weakening or destroying our forces of protection, so, as you enter the battle for our naval defense I am taking this opportunity to assure you of the appreciation and support of tens of thousands of men who still bear the scars of their national service.

Cordially yours,

MILLARD W. RICE,
National Commander Disabled American Veterans.

NATIONAL HEADQUARTERS,
UNITED SPANISH WAR VETERANS,
Washington, D. C., January 28, 1929.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: By direction of Commander in Chief William L. Grayson I am inclosing for your information a resolution urging upon the Senate the necessity for the immediate passage of the cruiser bill. This resolution was adopted at a meeting of the national legislative committee of the United Spanish War Veterans held in Washington, D. C., Monday, January 21.

Yours very truly,

[SEAL.]

JAS. J. MURPHY,
Quartermaster General.

Resolution adopted by national legislative committee, United Spanish War Veterans, January 21, 1929

Whereas our lack of preparedness upon entering the war with Spain caused untold hardships and much needless sacrifice of lives; and desiring to profit by the lessons of that experience by being better prepared in case of another war, we embodied in the fundamental law of our organization a clause "constantly to exert an influence to the end that our Government at all times shall provide an adequate defense"; and believing that our national security is again endangered because of the present lack of preparedness when compared to that of other countries, and believing the passage of the cruiser bill now pending before the United States Senate would be in no sense a war gesture, but only an effort to provide for long-delayed and necessary replacements to our Navy: Therefore be it

Resolved by the national legislative committee of the United Spanish War Veterans, That we respectfully urge upon the United States Senate the necessity for the immediate passage of the cruiser bill.

Mr. HALE presented numerous letters, papers, and telegrams in the nature of petitions from various civil, military, and patriotic organizations and citizens, praying for the prompt passage of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, when the Senate took a recess last night I was making some remarks relative to the international race in the building of naval armaments. I would like to call attention to the fact that the building of naval vessels has been for a great many years and still is in a state of continual improvement, resulting in increasing the efficiency of all naval armaments and vessels. In a naval war there is an advantage with the country having the newest naval vessels. If we should delay the construction of the naval vessels provided for in this bill we would be able to build better vessels on account of that delay than would be built if construction were undertaken now under the terms of the bill. Therefore it seems to me, inasmuch as everybody admits there is no danger of war or conflict with any other nation, that we should lose nothing by a delay, and that the proposition to strike out the time limitation in this bill ought to receive favorable consideration. Even though we are in favor of building all the vessels provided for in the bill, if by delay we can obtain more efficient and better vessels and profit by Great Britain or other countries pursuing immediately their building program, we ought, it seems to me, avail ourselves of the opportunity.

We have all read in the newspapers, no doubt, in the last few days of a cruiser which it is said is about to be constructed in Germany which is so far in advance of all the cruisers now in existence that it would have no difficulty in putting out of business quite a number of cruisers of the same size. That may not be true; I do not know anything about it except what I have read in the press; but it is a matter of common knowledge that the newest vessels are much superior in efficiency to those which have been previously built. A ship that was built yesterday is surpassed by the one that is built to-day, and the one that is constructed to-day becomes almost obsolete in comparison with the one that may be constructed to-morrow. So a delay, particularly when there is no danger involved, in the construction of these ships ought to give us a better navy and a more efficient fleet of ships than if we provided for their immediate construction.

Mr. President, wars do not just happen; they are made; they are the result of the actions of nations. They are not accidents; they come as a logical result of the conduct of nations in time of peace. There would have been no World War if Germany and Great Britain and France had not been armed to the teeth. It is perfectly natural, it is perfectly human, that when men or nations continue to arm themselves, to increase their armaments in a race with each other, ultimately they will come into conflict. It seems to me that if the world continues its present course in providing armaments, the result, as demonstrated by the history of the past, must be ultimately another World War. I do not know when; I do not know how soon; but nations can not violate the universal law of human nature without suffering the consequences. The naval vessels being built by one nation because some other nation is building naval vessels will result in a third nation building naval vessels and increasing its armament; that will result in the fourth nation taking the same course; and then the first nation, her ships being somewhat obsolete and out of date, will have to commence another circle. So the nations of the world travel around and around in a circle, piling up armaments, creating new instruments of human destruction, inventing new ways of taking human life, and eventually, with a chip on the shoulder of every nation in the world, one gets knocked off and the conflagration commences, as it did in the World War. That would not happen without these superarmaments; that would not take place if it were not for the suspicion that is aroused all over the world by the various nations adopting new methods of warfare and laying down new forms of ships, built for the purpose of destroying human life and property.

We can not avoid that suspicion. One has only to read the newspapers to know that this process is going on now. It is common knowledge everywhere in the civilized world that each nation is watching every other nation, and the course they will pursue will depend upon what other nations shall do. Unless some nation breaks this vicious circle, and says to the world, "We want to put an end to this unnecessary expenditure of public funds," which, if it does not bring a world conflagration, will bring a world subdued and bowed in poverty from taxation alone, no one can foresee what the result may be.

No nation is better qualified or equipped to make that proposition to the world than are we. Occupying the position that we do, with our financial resources, and with a Navy equal to any other navy in the world, unless it be the navy of Great Britain—and as to that there is an honest dispute and disagreement—with no cloud of danger upon the world's horizon, running no risk to our safety and running no risk in any way, we should make the move. All the civilized peoples of the world are waiting for such a move, the common people of every civilized nation on earth are now hoping that America may take the step.

Mr. President, a few days ago we ratified the peace treaty, which, in substance, binds us, as it will bind every other nation which may ratify it, not to use force or go to war to settle disputes that may arise in the future. If we should pass this bill, it would follow, it seems to me, that we would be proceeding on the theory that either we or some other nation or nations are going to violate that treaty; we would be proceeding on the assumption that that treaty is not going to be lived up to by the nations of the world. We are not willing to admit that we are going to violate it; we are not even willing to charge openly that any other nation, naming the nation, is going to violate it; but we are going on the assumption that some nation will violate it, and, hence, it will be of no account. Let us go on the other assumption just for a moment and see what the result will be. Let us assume for the moment that the civilized nations of the world that enter into that treaty are doing so in good faith, are going to obey its mandates, are going to abide by the solemn agreement which they make; take that assumption, and what would be the result?

Assuming that they will all ratify it, as I presume they will, it follows that war between civilized nations will disappear; that war will no longer be an element in the settling of international disputes; that standing armies and huge navies will be useless and of no account; that the world will be able to save the money which is now being expended for armaments and for navies and use it for other purposes or permit the people to keep it in their pockets. Is no that as fair an assumption as to assume that the treaty is only a scrap of paper and is not going to be obeyed?

Why should we select this treaty, framed on the beneficient theory of bringing about peace among the nations, and say it is going to be violated? We here ratify by the dozen treaties with the various nations of the world, and we ratify them on the assumption that the signatories are going to keep their word and are going to abide by the agreements which they thus make. Such agreements are harder to keep than the agreement contained in the so-called multilateral treaty. That is the easiest agreement to keep that has ever been made in the history of the civilized world. It only says that the nations of the world will not resort to war to settle disputes; that they outlaw war; that they are going in the future to settle their disputes in some peaceful way. Everybody wants to do that. One can go abroad through the world to-day and find no statesman, no citizen of any country, but desires to see that condition brought about. Why are we afraid? Why are we treating this treaty in a different light from any other treaty upon which we act; and why are we going to follow up that kind of agreement, assuming as I do, and as I believe, that we have ratified it in good faith, by providing for a larger naval expenditure than we have ever provided for in the history of the country in time of peace? Why are we now, right on the heels of that peace treaty, going to provide for a larger navy? What would be the use of the Navy if that treaty is to be adhered to? What is the use of all these ships if we are going to settle our disputes in the future by peaceful means? Why are we construing that treaty in this way when we have never construed any other treaty in a similar way?

Were we fooling? Were we playing? Did we not mean what we said? Do the other nations of the world show any indication that they are not in earnest? Are they any less desirous for peace than we? When we agree that we will not settle our disputes by force, we have made it unnecessary to have the force; and, on the other hand, the reverse is true: When we make that solemn agreement that we will not resort to war, we are naturally suspected of bad faith when we follow it up with the greatest naval program that we have ever undertaken oustide of a time of war.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I want to say that it strikes me that we are not giving to the civilized world the right kind of a demonstration of our good faith in that treaty. Why can we not wait to see whether the other nations agree to it? Why can we not let that treaty go for a few years and see how it works? Let us ascertain whether some of these nations are not acting in good faith. Why not test ourselves, especially when we can do it without any possible danger to our rights as a nation or our liberties as a people?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the discussion of this measure has been conducted with great frankness in the Senate. There has been severe criticism of the course of foreign countries; their good faith has been questioned, and forecasts of war with Great Britain or other nations have been expressed which are quite unusual in a legislative body. Perhaps it is better so, that the question should be discussed fully and freely.

As a Member of the Senate, I am unwilling to take the responsibility of opposing authorization for the construction of 15 cruisers. There is a possibility, though remote—very remote, as I verily believe—that the world may again become involved in conflict. The defense of our country and its dresides is a duty which no patriotic citizen can shirk. At the same time, I do favor the elimination of the time requirement governing their construction, as suggested by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and others, and supported, as I understand, not merely by the President of the United States but by the President elect, thus leaving the date of construction to the judgment of the President or to future action by Congress in the successive naval appropriation bills.

It was maintained yesterday that the pending bill contains a provision for the suspension of the proposed building program in case an agreement looking to disarmament is reached, and the intimation was that this is sufficient; but there is provision for the commencement of measures for the building of a third of the ships by June 30 next, and who could expect an agreement for disarmament to be reached in so short a time? Thus, this provision in the pending bill is not sufficient.

This is a crucial time. Shall the Kellogg treaty be an event of far-reaching importance in the cause of world amity or shall it be a mere gesture, as it has been termed by some of its critics? The effectiveness of this treaty must depend upon national policies and the forces of public opinion. The future of world peace depends very largely upon our own United States. We are in a position of leadership financially, industrially, and in all the great features which tend to make up national life; and our attitude on this subject will be most influential and may be controlling. We must face this responsibility; a nation like an individual has responsibilities which it must perform.

There will be no denying that the world's greatest desire at this time is to be relieved from the horrors of war. There are numerous factors at work which constitute sharply contrasting tendencies in this regard—some for and others against peace.

The threat of war is stimulated by the distrust and antagonisms which have existed among the nations of Euorpe for centuries. These have been accentuated by the late war, with its bitter recollections, and by the treaty of Versailles and later treaties, which imposed severe restrictions and large indemnities upon the vanquished. These treaties sought to remake the map of Europe, placing racial or national groups aggregating more than sixty millions of people under the domination of nations unfriendly or hostile, and, as it is alleged, in some cases altogether inferior in culture.

We may also mention the appropriation of the colonies of Germany.

To this, if I may summarize things looking toward war, must be added the regrettable fact that expenses and preparation for war, as compared with expenses prior to the Great War in 1914, have increased and are increasing in almost every nation in Europe. Great Britain, in the last year for which figures are available, expended for military purposes—army and navy—about $200,000,000 in excess of the amounts in 1914 and prior years. Incidentally, I may remark, when complaint is made of the burden of the indebtedness of that country to the United States, that this increase is $40,000,000 more than the approximate amount of annual payments on Great Britain's debt to us, and that several of the other countries, if they were to devote their military expenditures for a few years to the liquidation of the indebtedness to us, would pay off the full amount.

Among other things disastrous to peace may be mentioned the failure thus far of conferences and negotiations for disarmament and the utter failure of the naval conference called by President Coolidge.

I have thus briefly summarized the principal facts which threaten the cause of peace. Now, let us look to the other side of the picture.

On the other hand, there have been notable achievements for peace since Armistice Day in November, 1918.

The situation is very much influenced by the frightful dread of another war, which, with the progress of invention, would inevitably prove more deadly and destructive than the last and might even destroy modern civilization. Harmony and cooperation are coming to be universally regarded as essential for the rehabilitation of nations which have suffered most; also for the prosperity and happiness of the people. Moral and intellectual forces were never more active for a better understanding than now.

In measures looking to peace, chronologically, the League of Nations comes first, which embodies the idea of consultation and united action. While it is not probable that this country will assume membership in this organization, we have nevertheless cooperated in important meetings held at Geneva. The League has settled a number of minor differences, such as the controversy between Bulgaria and Greece, and has created bureaus which are devoted to the correlation of efforts of international societies, gathering information for universal benefit and further promoting uniform regulations as to labor which seek to ameliorate its condition. Anything which brings nations into closer contact has a potent influence for peace.

We may also mention the conference at Washington, 1921-22, placing a limit on battleships. Our action in that conference has been very much criticized; but not only was a limitation placed on the construction of battleships, but rights for China were secured, and our contentions in regard to that country were vindicated. Also, a treaty was negotiated for the settlement of controversies among the nations bordering on the Pacific.

Besides, there is the World Court, which has been functioning for several years and has given very general satisfaction in its decisions upon controversies between nations resorting to it.

Then there are the Locarno treaties of 1925, which provide means for the prevention of war between nations among which there had been serious friction.

There have been many arbitration treaties, some providing for the compulsory settlement of controversies, as between Denmark and Holland; others less broad in their scope, but all marking a distinct advance upon existing agreements.

The treaty of mutual guaranty between England, France, and Germany seeks to assure the prevention of aggression by France against Germany or Germany against France.

To all these must be added the notable achievements of the last year—arbitration and conciliation treaties in considerable number in which the United States has taken the lead. Special mention should be made of the treaty framed for amicable settlement of controversies among the nations of the New World. And last of all, the treaty for the renunciation of war, containing in a second clause—more important, perhaps, than the first—a declaration for peaceful settlement of international disputes. This last treaty assumes supreme importance.

A first objection to the 15 cruisers is the expense of $255,000,000 involved. Not only is the original construction of a ship expensive, but according to recent estimates the annual upkeep of a cruiser costs $1,247,000.

I say with the utmost earnestness that there is grave danger that the incoming administration will be embarrassed by a deficit. Our country is expanding in its activities.

Especial mention may be made of the cost of protection to the people of the Mississippi Valley and the construction of the Boulder Dam, which will entail very considerable expense. Enlargement of old activities or creation of new will require large appropriations. In the face of this fact we have to note that there has been a decrease of approximately $40,000,000 in the collection of internal-revenue taxes, and the prospective tariff bill, which it is expected will be enacted in the coming special session, may still further diminish the other class of taxes derived from import duties. Certainly those of either party do not wish to embarrass the next administration by the threat of a deficit, as the country must in large measure rely for its prosperity on diminished taxation and the assurance that national revenues equal national expenditures.

More important considerations, however, rest upon the influence of our action on the future peace of the world. Can anything be more absurd than the building of huge warships in preparation for a possible war between Great Britain and the United States? These two countries—with common language and traditions—ought to find some means of avoiding this enormous and unnecessary expense. Is it beyond the possibilities of diplomacy to secure such agreement? If so, a situation confronts us which indicates that we are lacking in the achievements essential to modern progress.

Fear of war with Great Britain is farcical.

In the first place, no nation in the world is so interested in the maintenance of peace and the promotion of foreign trade. In the next place, the British Isles depend for their food supply and raw material very largely on the United States and Canada. In recent years more than two-thirds of their imports of wheat and flour have come from Canada and the United States. The proportion of other essential commodities is even larger. If these supplies should be shut off it is difficult to understand how the people of Great Britain could be saved from starvation.

Still further, in case of war, Canada, the fairest jewel among British outlying possessions, would almost immediately be overrun by troops of the United States, and there would be an absolute cessation of exports from that country. Both are particularly vulnerable to attacks from us; the one more especially from the military standpoint, and the other from the economic standpoint. I make these statements in no offensive sense, because we are exceptionally friendly both to Canada and Great Britain. Though rivalry has been keen and bitter feeling has been aroused at times, for more than 100 years a way has been found to compose every difference.

The life of a warship is limited to a comparatively brief period. Twenty years is the standard adopted by some, 15 years by others. Battleships and cruisers go on the scrapheap in a comparatively short time. Some years ago, indeed, almost exactly 25 years from this day, in this Congress I referred to the high-sounding names of English warships—the Colossus, the Powerful, the Thunderer, the Terrible.

The very names were sufficient to frighten the timid.

I might add other names—the Vindictive, the Revenge, the Spitfire, and so on. So far as I can learn, not one of those great ships ever fired a shot in any conflict; long ago they were broken up.

New methods of warfare have been devised, and it may be said that in a general survey of the situation defensive warfare has made greater progress than offensive. There are not lacking many military experts who maintain that the airplane will be the most effective instrument of warfare in the future. Special emphasis should be laid upon the fact that the submarine and the destroyer, in both of which we have supremacy, have almost irresistible force for defense. Capt. Yates Stirling, now a rear admiral, and regarded as one of the ablest of our naval officers, has said:

> Battleships and battle cruisers, the monarchs of the sea, are as helpless before the submarine as a prize fighter is helpless before a burglar with an automatic pistol drawn. Our submarines could drive from our coasts the very largest fleet of battleships and cruisers.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that the sentiment of this country will approve our engaging in offensive warfare. If we forecast the future, our provision should be for sufficient equipment of war to provide not for attack but for defense.

Lieutenant Commander Gill says of the battle cruiser:

> The chief utility of the battle cruiser is now held to be that of a scout and raider.

It is reported—and the report has been serious enough to be recognized in an editorial in a local newspaper—that Germany has built a cruiser far and away more formidable than any of those heretofore constructed or projected, having 11-inch guns and a much larger cruising radius.

This is but an illustration of the fact that the types of warcraft become obsolete year by year, and there is not merely the ordinary obsolescence or wearing out but they are naturally superseded by other craft, the products of later inventions which render new ships more formidable than any existing warships can be.

It may be confidently asserted that the most ambitious advocates of the program presented will not be satisfied with 15 cruisers, nor yet with 30, nor even 50. To some it is the beginning of a race for what they may call "parity," but to others it means a requirement for a navy equal to that of any two nations in the world.

Of what are the advocates of this bill afraid? When the United States was much less powerful in arms, and, indeed, in trying situations, we were not attacked. In the Civil War the shutting off of the supply of cotton by the blockade deprived the countries of western Europe of their principal material for clothing. The English Navy was quite as powerful, relatively, then as now, and yet there was no intervention. In support of the successful enforcement of the Monroe doctrine, when was a shot ever fired or a sword drawn? In 1895, when our Navy was of the weakest, we demanded of Great Britain that the Venezuelan dispute as to boundary be arbitrated. This was the extreme application of the Monroe doctrine in more than a hundred years since it was first declared; and yet Great Britain, at first refusing, nevertheless yielded to our demand. In 1898, in the Spanish-American War, a majority of the nations of Europe would have liked to have intervened on behalf of Spain. It must be said that, according to all records, England was our friend at this time. Yet there was no intervention, and with a navy which was of no very considerable power we successfully fought out the war.

We have heard it iterated and reiterated that we must have a navy equal to that of Great Britain. I can not agree to this contention. The situation of the two countries is very radically different. Great Britain, with her island empire, densely populated, depends upon outlying portions of the world, her colonies and other countries, for the very means which give her life and economic existence. Various estimates are made as to how soon England, Scotland, and Wales would starve if food supplies were shut off from the outside. But in any event it is but a fraction of a year and probably rather a small one.

Again she has outlying possessions over the sea which demand that she give them protection, and to secure the units of the Empire it is necessary that cruisers and other warcraft be ready to protect them. I may say in this connection that when the count is made of the number of cruisers which Great Britain has we must take into account the three or four assigned to Australia and the two or three assigned to New Zealand, showing that the whole of her fleet would not be immediately available in the British Isles or for attack upon us.

I wish to call the attention of the Members of the Senate to an article by Theodore Roosevelt in the Kansas City Star of December 17, 1918. Among all our public men in the last two or three decades no one was more insistent upon a powerful navy than Theodore Roosevelt. In the year 1904 I expressed some sentiments against the number of battleships provided for in the then pending bill. As a result I received a letter from him, four pages in length, with many interlineations, conveying protests; a letter which I have regarded as so important that I filed it with an historical society. He was a great advocate of a larger navy. What did he say about our seeking to equal the navy of Great Britain? I quote:

> Over here representatives of the administration are demanding a navy bigger than that of Great Britain. The only possible interpretation of these facts is that the administration proposes to threaten Great Britain with having to get in a neck-to-neck competition with America to build the greatest navy in the world. Under these conditions the American people should, with common sense, look at what their own needs are and at what the needs of their allies are. Sooner or later any program will have to be tested by its results, and even if the United States started to emulate Great Britain's Navy, the enthusiasm to do so would vanish when it appeared that there was no earthly interest of ours to be served by the action. * * * Great Britain is an island separated from the huge military commonwealths of Europe by very narrow seas, and separated from her own greatest colonies by all the greatest oceans. To her, supremacy in the navy is a matter of life and death. America ought to have a first-class navy, but if she did not have a ship she might yet secure herself from any invasion. But Great Britain's Empire would not last one week, and she could not make herself safe at home one week, if her navy lost its supremacy. Incidentally to saving herself, the British Navy rendered incalculable service to us during the last four and a half years, and for the last 30 years has been a shield to the United States.

It has not yet been forgotten that when there was a threat of trouble out in the harbor of Manila the British admiral sent a friendly message to Admiral Dewey.

> Great Britain is not a military power in the sense that any of the nations of Continental Europe, or, indeed, Asia, are military powers. She had almost as much difficulty in developing her army in this war as we had in developing our Army. Her army is no more of a threat to other peoples than ours is.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment to ask a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GEORGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator remembers, however, I am sure, in connection with what he is quoting Mr. Roosevelt as saying, that there has been an enormous expansion of our American commerce since Mr. Roosevelt's time. For instance, if my memory serves me aright, our commerce with South America has increased since 1914, when we had a commerce of a value of $300,000,000, to a commerce of a value of $1,000,000,000. There has been a tremendous increase of several hundred per cent in our commerce with Africa, and a similar increase in our commerce with Asia. It seems to me those facts ought certainly to be taken into account in connection with any views which Mr. Roosevelt expressed.

I may say that, looking at the conditions which surrounded him, I for one agree with him entirely in the correctness of his conclusions. I do not think the special need of Great Britain for naval armament is comparable with ours. I think their naval strength and our naval strength are not commensurate terms. But I do submit to the Senator that it seems to me he ought to take into account the tremendous increase in our foreign commerce since Mr. Roosevelt's time.

Mr. BURTON. I recognize the pertinency of the comment of the able Senator from Maryland. I shall speak of the matter of commerce before I am through. I will say, however, at the very outset that as a comparative proposition, when we put side by side our commerce before 1914 and our commerce in the years succeeding the great conflict, I do not see any great difference in the requirements. True, a large share of exports were carried in foreign vessels and a large share is probably still carried in foreign vessels. It is true we have reached out into portions of the earth which were not much frequented by our traders in earlier days and have vastly increased our commerce with South America, with Asia, and with Africa. But the relative position is not so different from what it has been in prior years.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. KING. With the Senator's permission, I suggest—what he knows perhaps better than I—that one of the principal causes of Germany's industrial development and the remarkable increase in her foreign trade and commerce, is to be found in the fact that she has been relieved from military and naval burdens. While some nations have been spending hundreds of millions annually for the maintenance of armies and navies, Germany has employed her revenues for internal development and for carrying her products to the nations of the earth. Her percentage of increase in foreign commerce has been, I think, as great as that of the United States. Armies and navies have not been deemed essential by Germany since the war in order that she might find world markets. She has not needed guns to open the ports of the world nor navies to take her flag and her products to almost every land.

In my opinion those persons representing the best thought of Germany support the position that battleships are not the most effective agents of peace nor the most successful instrumentalities to carry on trade and commerce. It is not a formula that must be accepted that trade only follows the battleship and the mailed fist.

The Senator from Maryland referred to the increasing foreign trade of South America. Senators know that the Latin-American countries are not militaristic and do not favor standing armies or big navies. Indeed, the entire naval tonnage of the Latin-American Republics is wholly insignificant. Brazil, Argentina, and other South American nations whose trade has so greatly expanded during the past two or three years have brought about this happy situation without cruisers or battleships. Mr. President, I repeat, battleships are not necessary in order to secure trade. Good will, good wares, and good salesmanship, all of which Americans possess in a high degree, will put our commerce upon the seven seas and into every part of the world.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit me again to interrupt him?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator from Utah forgets, it seems to me, that Brazil and Argentina are protected by our battleships and battle cruisers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio permit a further interruption?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. KING. In my opinion the Latin-American Republics do not accept the view expressed by the Senator from Maryland. They do not ask the United States to protect them from invasion or to assume a protectorate over them. They do not ask that our battleships and other vessels of war shall protect them, or that this great Republic shall constitute itself their guardian. The Senator from Ohio is quoting from Mr. Roosevelt. May I call attention to a statement of the latter to the effect that such nations as Brazil, Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, and Paraguay are so advanced in stability and power that there is no need of applying the Monroe doctrine to them. He further stated that they are able to help themselves, and that any help accorded them by the United States would be given as an auxiliary rather than as a principal, and of that character that we would give to Australia or Canada.

Mr. President, the Monroe doctrine has been misinterpreted and it has provoked resentments among our Latin-American neighbors whose friendship we should always possess.

Mr. BRUCE. May I interrupt further to say that the information of the Senator is entirely different from mine. I heard the Brazilian ambassador make the very interesting statement a few nights ago that Brazil is the only country in South America that ever formally acquiesced in the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. BURTON. Departing from the discussion of the Monroe doctrine back to the quotation from President Roosevelt, I continue:

> Therefore we Americans find ourselves, as regards the British Navy, in this position: That it is of vital consequence to Great Britain to have the greatest navy in the world; it is emphatically not of any consequence to us to have as big a Navy as Great Britain, and in all ordinary circumstances the British Navy can be counted upon as a help to the United States, and never as a menace. In such circumstances, to set ourselves to work to build a navy in rivalry with Great Britain's, and above all to do this as political bluff, is worse than silly. Our own Navy should be ample to protect our own coasts and to maintain the Monroe doctrine.

Now, Mr. President, I will soon come to the subject of commerce, but as preliminary to the treatment of that subject I wish to say the economic progress of the world at present has no handicap comparing in seriousness with that created by the expansion of military establishments and the withdrawal from productive employment of millions employed in armies and navies. I can not agree with the opinion that war is a necessary and inevitable event, part of the world's history in the past, and that it will be part of the history of the future. On the other hand, manifest destiny would demand a more sensible, a more rational means for the settlement of international controversies.

I have the greatest admiration for the heroism of men who have engaged in war on the battle field, but, after all, are there not opportunities in the peaceful life of nations for similar heroism? Can we not compare the achievement of Captain Fried and his efficient officer, Manning, in their skill and heroism in a deed in which they did not destroy life, but saved 32 despairing seamen from the perils of the sea?

> Peace hath her victories
> No less renown'd than war.

The argument has been made that the cruisers provided for by the pending bill are necessary for our commerce. Let us consider that suggestion. When will we be likely to export more automobiles or cash registers at the point of a gun? The demand for our products would be most substantially diminished from any nation over which we should seek to domineer or from which we should obtain a political or commercial concession by the sword. Trade does not follow the battleship or the cruiser. It is, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has said, a matter of good will, of good wares, and good salesmanship.

Thus the threat of war would be a hindrance rather than promote commerce. Then, as a practical question, is it possible with the aid of 15 cruisers to guard the lanes of commerce on the seven seas? A single raider cruiser or merchant ship equipped with a few guns could in any part of the world, as did the German cruiser Emden, create havoc in our commerce. It is not 15 cruisers, nor yet 30 cruisers, or more, that could guard all the avenues of trade.

In the last analysis the aid of cruisers would only be available to force a belligerent country to withhold restrictions on our commerce. This would mean war, in which we would be engaged, and the volume of foreign trade would diminish.

I trust the great principle of free ships make free goods and the immunity of neutral commerce may be secured by agreement. That was one of the principal contentions of President Wilson when he left this country for the Paris conference. I can not be sure of my information, but I have been told that he was informed by Lloyd George that if he insisted on that contention the conference could not continue along amicable lines.

It may be said historically that until about the time of the beginning of the French Revolution the principle of the immunity of neutral shipping was maintained by the nations. Great Britain at about that time began, largely because of her dominance on the seas, to insist on the new doctrine. We have stood strongly for the rights of neutral ships, our diplomats and legislators taking a stronger position in that direction than our courts, for some of the earlier decisions were not altogether in accordance with that doctrine. We have stood for the free passage of neutral ships and neutral commerce, except that we live in a veritable glass house by reason of some things that were done between 1861 and 1865. Mr. Wharton, in his very able work on international law, said that except for the abnormal and exceptional spasm of the Civil War we have always stood for the rights of neutrals. We certainly stand for them now; and, as was remarked by the able Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in a speech some days ago, there are strong arguments to the effect that the protection of neutral commerce would be for the advantage of the nation which has insisted upon the right of search and upon interference with the rights of neutrals. I can not relinquish the idea that, as a result of conference and that concession which nations should make to each other, our contention may yet be granted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not quite understand the Senator's allusion to the Napoleonic wars and the question of blockade. Speaking with the interpretation which I placed upon his remarks, I think it should be said that Great Britain believed that the ambitions of Napoleon would lead to the destruction of Europe, and if unchecked perhaps the overthrow of the British Empire. The British people took the view that the only way of combating Napoleon was to enforce a blockade in most of European waters and to prevent Napoleon from obtaining supplies and commodities from various countries of the world. The blockade which Great Britain attempted to enforce undoubtedly interfered with the commerce of neutral countries.

During the World War the allied nations believed the situation justified a blockade of German ports and the adoption of measures to prevent munitions of war and substantially all products from reaching the Central Powers. There was an interference with neutral shipping, and many neutral nations complained against the allied nations.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think there is much in what the Senator from Utah has said. I would, however, for a full understanding of the subject, call attention to the distinction between a blockade and the seizing of ships on the ocean because they carry contraband. There is a decided difference between the two. I do not know that we are ready to demand that blockades shall be abolished. The Paris conference of 1856, in asserting certain principles, laid down the principle that a blockade, to be respected, must be effective; and that principle has been insisted on by other nations since. I think that the course of Great Britain toward us in the late war was marked by severity and by much that was arbitrary, though her action can readily be explained in view of the terrible contest in which she was engaged. The correspondence seems to reveal that our minister, Mr. Page, was, perhaps, unduly partial to Great Britain and sought to justify some of her actions which naturally in the assertion of our rights he would not have sanctioned.

In this connection I want to say that our consul general at London at that time, Mr. Skinner, now minister to Greece, at Athens, played a very important part and is entitled to very much credit for reaching agreements and framing regulations in regard to the treatment of our ships seized on the sea which very much ameliorated the situation as regards our own shipping.

Mr. President, I wish to say another thing in that connection: I do not quite agree with some things that have been said here to the effect that commerce, the maintenance of the rights of traders, is the principal cause of war. It may preponderate, especially when we take into account the needs of a country such as Great Britain—and, under some circumstances, the same thing might be said as to Japan—which must depend upon commerce with the outside world for its very lifeblood.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. But the Senator will agree that it is a historic fact that we have really never had any trouble with Great Britain except over commerce?

Mr. BURTON. I think I should modify that a little. If we take into account the discussions preceding the declaration of war against Great Britain in 1812, we realize that, while the main contention was in regard to impressment and the seizure of our ships, there was a "hang over" from the Revolutionary War, resentment at the slowness of Great Britain in evacuating territory belonging to us, and a sort of general ill will, which I think had something to do with that declaration. As the Senator will recall, Mr. Webster most vigorously opposed our engaging in that war. There were men of youth and enthusiasm, including, especially, Mr. Clay, who insisted on war; but I do not think the action of Great Britain in the matter that has been mentioned was the sole cause of our entering that contest.

Mr. BORAH. It might not have been the sole cause, but it was certainly the dominating cause.

Mr. BURTON. Perhaps so.

Mr. BORAH. And the only cause which was alleged upon the surface. We did not say anything about any "hang over" from the Revolutionary War or indicate any other reason.

Mr. BURTON. We did not say anything about it in our declaration, but it had a potent influence on the public opinion of the time.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose that is true; but the reason for our going to war was the interference by Great Britain with our commerce and with our sea rights.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but, in addition to reasons of commerce as a cause of war there is the national spirit, which I think has been intensified in some degree since the World War—the idea that every citizen thinks he depends upon the prestige and strength of the country to which he belongs for his standing in the world.

That national spirit causes citizens of any country to be extremely sensitive in case of any incident, such as interference with the rights of a fellow citizen, or anything which interferes with national pride. Then, again, there is the desire for enlargement of territory that is as old as the life of nations, the desire to increase their borders. Then, still further, there have been, of course, dynastic quarrels which have led to war; in earlier years religious animosities were a fruitful cause of conflicts, and I might enumerate other causes, such as the recollection of past grievances or oppression by another country.

Unfortunately, this disposition on the part of some peoples is neither dead nor even dying. It presents a threat to the peace of the world.

In the present situation, while there must be due regard for national defense and protection of all our interests, it is not rational that our policies should be dominated entirely by our fears. Let us not be lacking in hope and faith—hope that the future has things in store for us, for the welfare and progress of mankind, surpassing anything in the past; faith that we shall not altogether be fettered by apprehensions of danger, but that there will be good will among the peoples which shall lead them to better relations. This country, so strong, so peace loving, should prove a pathfinder, an example for the world in looking toward a better day.

Why should there not be progress in the one cause most needed in the world, that of peace? There has been wonderful progress in everything which pertains to the material world. The facilities and comforts of life have been many times multiplied. Medical science has prevented disease and postponed death. The world is being made new. Can not the intelligent efforts of the diplomats and legislators of the world, supported by a powerful public opinion, be brought to bear on this great problem, which is the one thing needful?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE obtained the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I know that Senators will gladly avail themselves of an opportunity to meet Captain Fried, commander of the steamship America.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from New York.

THANKS TO OFFICERS AND CREW OF STEAMSHIP "AMERICA"

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, Senators will remember that a few days ago I introduced a bill proposing to recognize the heroic conduct and devotion to duty and skill on the part of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. America. The bill has received the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Commerce. From that committee I now report back favorably the bill and I submit a report (No. 1605) thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may receive consideration at this moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5578) recognizing the heroic conduct, devotion to duty, and skill on the part of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. America, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the term "crew" as used in this act shall mean and include any person carried on the ship's register or serving on the ship in any capacity, regardless of rank or rating, at the time of the rescue referred to in this act.

SEC. 2. That the thanks and appreciation of the Congress of the United States be, and they are hereby, tendered to the officers and crew of the U. S. S. America as constituted on January 23, 1929, for the heroic conduct shown and noble service rendered in the rescue of the officers and crew of the Italian steamship Florida.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RECEPTION TO CAPT. GEORGE FRIED

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in order that Senators may meet Captain Fried, commander of the steamship America, I move that the Senate stand in recess for five minutes.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and the Senate took a recess for five minutes.

The Senate being in recess, Capt. George Fried was escorted into the Chamber by the Vice President, and standing in the area in front of the Secretary's desk greeted the Members of the Senate as they were introduced to him by the Vice President. At the expiration of the recess the Senate reassembled and the Vice President resumed the chair.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE resumed and concluded his speech, which is as follows:

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I do not rise to pronounce a eulogy on our country or to deliver a philippic against any nation. Perhaps it were easy to do either; but to pronounce a eulogy is untimely and to deliver a philippic would be extremely unwise.

My respect for the different opinion of others prompts me to express my own, and, if not unduly interrupted, I shall not long engage the attention of the Senate.

The importance of this proposed legislation is appreciated by us all; it can not be overstated. It is proposed to authorize the construction, within a period of three years, of 15 modern cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier. Patriotic men and women may differ as to the necessity for building, or the wisdom of building, this or any number of cruisers now or at any time. Some would commence now; others would indefinitely delay. Some good and patriotic citizens think the building of these or any number of cruisers will be provocative of war; other good and patriotic citizens think the building of these cruisers will be a guaranty of peace.

The coordinate branch of Congress, made up of a large number of patriotic men drawn from the 48 States, decided that the welfare of our Nation called and calls for the proposed increase of our naval force.

With unfeigned respect for the matured judgment of others equally devoted to our common country, and not unmindful of the arguments which have been made in support of their views, I have come to the conclusion that the House of Representatives acted wisely when they passed this measure and sent it to us for our consideration.

In reaching a decision we should remember the past, consider the present, and endeavor to look into the future.

We should, of course, bear in mind the cost of maintaining an adequate navy, but we should not overlook the value of the rights to be safeguarded.

It is an hour for dispassionate thought, not for perfervid declamation; an hour to consider the world as it is, not as it might be.

OUR CONSTITUTIONAL DUTY

I trust it will not seem superfluous for me to remind ourselves that Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides—

The Congress shall have power * * * to provide and maintain a Navy.

And that Congress is vested with power, which runs hand in hand with duty—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, * * *.

Washington, Hamilton, Franklin, Ingersoll, Wilson, Madison, all of those wise men who framed our Constitution and started this Republic on its voyage, agreed that a navy was needed to guard the precious cargo.

It has been asked: Why do we need a navy now?

I wish, first, briefly to consider the subject from the standpoint of the United States as a neutral, and second, to consider the subject from the standpoint of the United States as a belligerent.

THE UNITED STATES AS A NEUTRAL

As a neutral, let us first consider the proposition as to the necessity for an adequate navy.

We are a separate nation, one among many rival nations.

The "parliament of man," the "federation of the world," is a dream, the beatific vision of the poet, the realization of which lies far, far in the future.

There always have been, there always will be, separate nations. Perhaps it was divinely so ordained.

Standing on Mars Hill, in Athens, God's immortal ambassador, St. Paul, said:

God hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation.

Wherefrom we may infer that, whereas in a broad sense all mankind is of one blood, as being above the beasts of the field, they are divided into separate nations and the "bounds of their habitation" determined.

We have become a great and prosperous nation, and it may be our greatness excites the fear, our prosperity arouses the envy, of other nations. We have territorial possessions.

I listened with an attentive ear to the thoughtful, the dispassionate, discussion of this question by the learned Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and particularly did I take note of his reference to the wide extended possessions of Great Britain. We, too, have extended possessions, far extended, far remote from continental United States. Our flag floats over Alaska, the Philippines, Hawaii, American Samoa, the Panama Canal Zone, Porto Rico, the Virgin Islands.

These territories contain 716,141 square miles. They have a population of 14,256,422. The value of shipments from these possessions to the United States in 1927 amounted to $371,639,000. The value of shipments from the United States to these possessions amounted to $273,181,000.

The details for 1927 may be interesting.

Alaska contains an area of 590,884 square miles; a population of 55,036; value of shipments to the United States amounted to $51,314,000; value of shipments from the United States amounted to $35,604,000.

Hawaii contains an area of 6,449 square miles; a population of 333,420; value of shipments to the United States amounted to $106,370,000; value of shipments from the United States amounted to $79,666,000.

The Philippine Islands contain an area of 114,400 square miles; a population of 12,354,000; value of shipments to the United States amounted to $115,984,000; value of shipments from the United States amounted to $69,521,000.

Porto Rico contains an area of 3,435 square miles; a population of 1,440,000; value of shipments to the United States amounted to $96,902,000; value of shipments from the United States amounted to $86,319,000.

The Virgin Islands contain an area of 142 square miles; a population of 20,728; value of shipments to the United States amounted to $810,000; value of shipments from the United States amounted to $1,799,000.

(At this point Mr. SHORTRIDGE yielded to Mr. JONES and a recess was taken to receive Captain Fried.)

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, previous to the recess, I was considering the United States as a neutral and the rights of a neutral, and was briefly calling attention to our wide, extended territorial possessions, perhaps almost as far extended in point of distance as those of Great Britain. I had alluded to the remark of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who advanced the thought that because of Great Britain's far-extended possessions she was fully justified in maintaining a navy far greater than that of the United States. I also called attention to the fact that our flag floats over Alaska, over the Philippines, over Hawaii, over a portion of the Samoan group, over the Panama Zone, over Porto Rico, over the Virgin Islands, and on some other small spots, so to speak, lost in the ocean. I had called attention to the commerce already developed between us and our outlying territorial possessions and to the population of those several territories. Why was I doing that? Obviously in order to show that we also have valuable possessions and valuable rights which as a neutral—I trust we shall never be required to assert our rights as a belligerent—as a neutral we should safeguard and protect. In other words, Mr. President—and I say it not as a matter of patriotic pride but as a fact—the sun never sets on the American flag and beneath that flag wherever it floats are millions of happy, prosperous, and secure people.

In addition to our great internal domestic trade we have a vast foreign commerce. In 1928 our exports amounted to $5,129,000,000 and our imports to $4,090,000,000. Need I add that this commerce extends to practically all separate nations or countries on the earth, and need I add further that rights growing out of this world-extended commerce are similarly extended to all parts of the world? The rights growing out of this world-extended commerce in a sense exist all around the earth. Thus it is seen we have great world-extended interests, to become greater, which as a nation we are morally and, of course, legally justified in guarding and protecting, and the duty is ours who have been chosen in part to speak for this Nation, it is the Senate's duty to do whatever shall be deemed necessary to guard and keep safe those great and increasing interests.

The seven seas are the common heritage of mankind. No one nation owns or should own the seven seas or any one of the seven seas. No one nation should rule or claim the right "to rule the waves." In time of peace—and I am still thinking of neutrals' rights—in time of peace all is well; merchant vessels come and go unmolested; and the seas are free and there is "freedom of the sea." But in time of war—what then? The right to navigate the seas is interfered with. Hence arises the question as to the right of neutral nations to trade with the belligerents, and hence the question, What is contraband of war? And that question provokes another, Is there any recognized law or rule determining what is and what is not contraband of war? That is a phrase which we all understand, but which perhaps many of the good people throughout our country do not fully understand.

Attempts have been made to agree as to what is and what is not permissible commerce with a belligerent nation. For example, in 1856 there was adopted by the consent of many nations what was known as the declaration of Paris, which laid down certain rules in respect of contraband, meaning, in respect of what kind of commodities might be carried unmolested to a belligerent nation by a neutral nation. The declaration of Paris provided:

1. Privateering is and remains abolished.
2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.
3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag.
4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective. That is to say, maintained by a force sufficient to prevent access to the coast of the enemy.

I need not pause to point out—it has been stated here by different Senators—how these rules were flagrantly disregarded so far as we were concerned during the World War. Of course, it is highly desirable that the law or rules as to the trading and commercial rights of neutrals should be codified; that is to say, agreed upon by maritime nations. If these rights could be agreed upon, and if the rules to protect them should be observed by belligerent nations, commerce would continue and friction would be avoided; but is there reason for rational hope or belief that certain great nations will agree to a codification of neutrals' trading rights during war time, or that those rights would be respected by belligerents engaged in mortal combat?

The chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] appear to think that some satisfactory agreement with the great powers as to neutrals' rights can be reached, and hence they plead for delay in order that an effort may be made to reach such an agreement—an agreement, of course, to be desired, a consummation, indeed, devoutly to be wished. If I understand their position, each of these learned Senators admits that, failing such an agreement, we should build more cruisers.

It will be seen in a few moments that I have compressed my thoughts into a few words, for I do not intend long to delay the Senate. Therefore, without elaborating my reasons, I submit to these two learned Senators, I submit to this body, that to postpone this legislation will not hasten or assist in reaching any desired agreement as to neutral rights.

Judged by the past, judged by current pronouncements, judged by present cruiser building in every great or potentially great maritime nation on earth, I have no reason to believe that they will enter into any such desired agreement, or—which is perhaps of more present importance—that they will cease building cruisers pending conference and negotiations for such agreement.

Why, then, indefinitely postpone action? If we need additional cruisers to protect our neutral rights, now, in my humble judgment, is the time to commence to build them.

I ventured somewhat timidly, perhaps somewhat afraid—though I am not conscious of being much afraid—to question the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee as to whether he thought or whether he had reason to think or to hope that by delay satisfactory agreements in respect of neutral rights could be reached; and I am still waiting for a definite reply. It is true he in part replied by saying that at least we should make the effort to arrive at such an agreement; but why make an abortive effort? Why make a futile effort? And I repeat myself to say that I have heard no reason given for hope that such an agreement would be sooner reached by our postponing action upon this bill.

Mr. President, that phrase, "neutral rights," is very fully understood by the Senate; but I would have the country understand that those rights are essential to the commerce of this Nation. It is not carrying argument too far to say that those rights are essential to the prosperity of the people of our country—and those rights should be guarded. We ought not to surrender or abandon them. We ought not to suffer them to be utterly disregarded, ignored, trampled upon—not unless we are willing to abandon foreign commerce; not unless we are willing to keep to the shore.

Therefore, if cruisers are needed for any purpose, one of those purposes is to protect our rights as a peaceful neutral Nation engaged in lawful, peaceful commerce with the peoples of the earth.

THE UNITED STATES AS A BELLIGERENT

And now may I devote a few moments to considering this proposition from the standpoint of the United States as a belligerent, as a nation engaged in war?

It is perfectly clear, as I have said, that our rights as a neutral will be ignored in the future, as in the past, if we are impotent to defend them. We should be able to defend them; and, being able to defend them, they will not be ignored or violated. Moreover, if our neutral rights are respected, as they will be if we are known to be able to defend them, we shall not be drawn into war. Thus, our commercial rights will be safeguarded and war be avoided; and a capable navy will accomplish these two great national blessings. If that is not perfectly manifest, perfectly obvious to the dullest mind, I am unable to make it manifest.

Of course, if we become a belligerent nation, we are vitally interested in a capable navy. We are now at peace, the nations are at peace; and there is no present necessity to assert our neutral rights. Our policy is peace. We have no ambition to gratify by war. We do not covet the possessions of any nation. We meditate no attack upon any nation or any people. No nation washed by any sea need fear us or our Navy. We are solemnly committed by treaty to a peaceful, pacific solution of all international controversies.

That treaty will be kept by us—kept in letter and in spirit—and we hope it will be likewise kept by every signatory power, great and small.

It is not statesmanship, it is not the true spirit of America, to scoff and sneer at this great treaty ratified by the Senate of the United States. But, Mr. President, if war should come, what then? Upon our part it will be, in truth and in fact, a defensive war. I hesitate and regret even to contemplate such a misfortune; but if we should be attacked, we must be able to defend ourselves and keep the Stars and Stripes where it has ever been, triumphant in the sky.

If equipped and known to be equipped to defend ourselves on sea and land, war will not come upon us. No nation will be insane enough to attack us. I do not say that boastfully; I do not say it to offend; but I repeat and say that no nation washed by any sea will attack us if it be known that we shall be ready to put forth our power.

Yes; our policy is peace on earth with all nations, on land and on sea, "entangling alliances with none." We are midway between mighty oceans. We see the waters across which the Pilgrims ventured, "lone, wandering, but not lost," now the great highway of commerce. We see the waters first disturbed by Magellan, then a "gray and melancholy waste," now traversed by countless ships laden with products of our and alien lands. We would have these oceans plowed and furrowed by the keels of peaceful vessels, not reddened by the blood of war. We would be friendly rivals with other nations in commerce, in the arts and sciences, in every peaceful effort to advance the cause of righteous civilization.

No, Mr. President, no, gentlemen of the Senate, I do not forget the past, its lessons, its crimes, its follies, and I would not have my country forget the past.

I look down the ages and I, too, see sire and lad, matron and maid, go to death as to a banquet of love, for their country, for its altars and its fires. I see the wreck and ruin, the pain and agony, the horror and desolation, caused by wicked, unrighteous war, and I wonder whether man, created in God's image, will ever cease to be the fighting animal and dwell in peace and happiness on the earth given him. I do not know. I only hope.

But this I do know: A righteous, peace-loving nation, adequately armed to defend itself, is safe. Such a nation—and I would fain believe that ours is such—armed to defend itself, can look heaven and earth in the face without a blush and without a fear.

We have been repeatedly reminded of ancient, medieval, modern foreign wars, and told that it is more than foolish to enter into peace treaties. They who thus declaim against treaties forget that such treaties have stayed for long periods of time the bloody hand of war.

True, sir, treaties have been broken. Treaties may be broken, but he is less than a statesman who advises his country not to enter into treaties of peace.

We have been told of our own wars—our Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the war with Spain, and the World War, and we have had sad memories awakened by being reminded of our Civil War. Time has healed that wound. Brave men met brave men, and gallant soldiers stormed forts and heights by gallant soldiers defended. If America grieved over what she thought was the folly of some of her sons, yet she was proud of the valor of them all. Thank God we have long ago taken up Mason and Dixon's line and wrapped it around the hearts of our people. I love to believe that from the blue above the spirits of General Lee and General Grant reunited in death, look down upon their countrymen reunited forever.

They are reunited, sir, with one hope, with one altar, with one love, and, thus united, with one future; thus united, abhorring war and cherishing peace; thus united and standing among the nations "with malice toward none, with charity for all," they will see to it that the rights of America, on land and on sea, shall be guarded and preserved.

Why do I do myself the pleasure to say these words? It is to emphasize the fact that, as a united people, we are strong, and yet smitten with the love of peace with all the nations of the earth. There is no nation, great or small, east or west, or south or north, that has any reason to question our good faith or to fear because we think it is necessary to enlarge our naval force. We are at peace and would continue at peace with them all. But lest others may have hostile intent, lest others may harbor ambition for territorial expansion and world control, lest others break the peace and imperil our rights or our safety, lest others seek to drive us from the sea, out of that abundance of caution that Washington enjoined we should be able to defend ourselves against any force that may come against us. In time of peace I would insure its continuance, and peace with us will be continued if we have a Navy such as this bill is designed to provide for and maintain.

We can not call back yesterday. There is an Arabian maxim to this effect:

> Four things come not back—the spoken word, the spent arrow, the past life, the lost opportunity.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I recall another old oriental saying:

> Even God can not cancel the past.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is a very appropriate thought. We can not call back yesterday, but we can hear, and we should hearken to the warning voice of history and heed the stern command of duty.

We hold in trust this Republic. If we be not recreant, if we be not decadent, if we be not impotent we shall keep our country safe and free, a righteous nation wedded to peace, a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people", an example, it may be an inspiration, for all the peoples of the earth.

Why hesitate, therefore? Why postpone? In time of peace let us prepare to insure peace. In time of our strength and peace let us provide for the continuance of our strength and peace.

I thank those who have done me the honor to remain while I have spoken. I trust no word has escaped me which is offensive to any who differs. I trust that nothing said during this debate by any of us will disturb any foreign country or cause the representative of any foreign country to think that we purpose increasing our Navy in the manner suggested by this bill as the result of any feeling of hostility, or as indicative of any hostile action on our part in the future.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. Does he not think, because he looks at this matter from the same viewpoint as that entertained by many other Senators, that we have no disposition to match ship and ship, gun and gun with Great Britain in anything in the nature of naval competition, but that we are simply adopting a standard of prudence which Great Britain has prescribed for us by her actions?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I very fully entertain that view. To detain Senators for just a moment longer, I do not regard this bill as a step in the direction of competitive building or running a race. While I am not indifferent to other countries, I am only and forever thinking of my own. When I allude to the wide Pacific, when I call attention to Alaska, when I mention the Philippines, when I point to Samoa or the Panama Canal, or turn my eyes to look eastward across the Atlantic, all the while I am thinking of my country and what may happen to my country. I am not saying that any one of the nations in the directions suggested now contemplates attacking our country or its rights. But I am thinking of my country, and I want a capable, up-to-date, adequate navy, presumably and I hope in fact fully able to protect the United States of America.

We are a continent. We are great upon a continent, and we are great upon far extended territory. We are great upon the seas in the sense that our rights float upon the sea. I want no trouble with any of the nations which may be near or far from any of the possessions I have suggested. God knows I want no trouble with Mother England. We had two wars with her. The Senate will pardon me if I say that during all the discussion here in the Senate I have heard much about "wicked wars"; little, if anything, about righteous wars. I say there have been righteous wars.

Mr. BRUCE. There have been noble and holy wars.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Noble and holy and glorious wars, approved by Heaven and by all good men. I have always been careful, however, in denouncing war to characterize it as "the wicked wars, the unrighteous wars," where a nation has sought to overrun and oppress another or to rob it of its legitimate rights. Far from my thought or my belief is it that we will have war with Great Britain. But if any such misfortune as that should overwhelm the world, then the words of the great man who came from the great State of Maryland represented by the great Senator will come true. I dare say that Maryland never produced a greater orator or more splendid champion of America than Henry Winter Davis. Let us not pursue the painful thought. But having said so much, speaking as we do the language that Shakespeare spoke, paying homage to her greatness and remembering her contributions to human civilization, I do not propose that Britannia shall rule the waves and drive Uncle Sam off the seas.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Senator has no idea that Great Britain entertains any such thought. I imagine that the Senator believes that we, with our enormous foreign commerce, ought to be governed by the same prudential considerations as those by which Great Britain wisely governs herself.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator has expressed my thought in his last sentence.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, I want to say a few words in regard to the pending bill, because it seems to me there are two significant facts represented in the bill which ought to have the consideration of the Senate. Those significant facts are, first, that the class of ships which is proposed to be built under this bill is the only class of naval craft that is used equally in time of war and in time of peace. The light cruiser has a mission, both in war and in peace, in the protection of the commerce of our country.

The second significant fact which the Senate ought to consider is that when we talk of a race in naval armament, we should remember that this class of ships, the cruiser, useful equally in peace as it is in war, is the only class of ships that Britain, the great rival naval power of the world, has built and is building in excess of the normal demands of the accepted 5–5–3 ratio when compared with other classes of craft in the United States Navy.

Those two significant facts, I believe, form the basis of a theme which it would be well for America, as a growing nation, with a growing world trade, to consider most carefully, and this theme forms the basis for the needs of this increased cruiser program and produces the need of its immediate construction.

I look back to the time when the war was ending, when the whole world was torn apart, and the credit of the nations was in jeopardy. I remember the way in which the British cabinet assisted its business interests in the immediate work of location of the great oil fields of the world. I bow with respect to the business acumen of that body of men which it seems had in view the ultimate exhaustion of the oil supplies of the United States; which also had in view the tremendous indebtedness which they had acknowledged to this country. These men saw that the control of the oil fields of the world would put Britain eventually in a position to supply that needed essential in this country's development, and through the tribute paid for oil assist themselves by making us join in paying the British debt to America.

When I look at their record of cruiser building, the building of the kind of ships of the navy most useful in times of peace; when I look at the needs of Great Britain in the establishment and development of her world trade, for she is a manufacturing nation, with less relative power of consumption at home than any other nation; when I think of this class of ships as already going into the far parts of the earth assisting her effort to regain the trade that had once been hers, I again acknowledge the business acumen of the British cabinet that could see in the development of that class of naval ships, for the protection of its enormous sea-borne commerce, the great hope of the British nation for reconstructing itself financially after the cataclysm of the war.

And what of America? Largely as a result of the war the foreign trade of America grew and developed, and since has further grown and developed during the time required for reconstruction by the other nations, until to-day its foreign export trade is greater than that of any other nation in the world.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield.

Mr. KING. I ask for information, because I do not wish to misunderstand the Senator. I understood the Senator to say that following the war Great Britain utilized the war vessels which had been constructed during the war for the purpose of carrying her trade and commerce throughout the world.

Mr. SACKETT. Not the war vessels for carrying the trade, but for developing the trade.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator upon reflection will reach the conclusion which the facts justify, namely, that Great Britain following the war very promptly scrapped 1,367,000 tons of her war vessels.

Mr. SACKETT. Yes.

Mr. KING. And subsequent to that scrapped 1,000,000 tons more.

Mr. SACKETT. Yes.

Mr. KING. The vessels which she utilized for trade and for carrying the trade and carrying her flag were the merchant ships which avoided and escaped the submarines and those which she has constructed since.

Mr. SACKETT. I agree with the Senator. I was not speaking of merchant ships at all. I was speaking of the number of cruisers which Great Britain had at the end of the war and which she has built since, the only class of naval armament in which she has gone ahead of the United States in the development of naval craft; that she had a reason for so doing; that she had a great world trade which had been injured and hurt as a result of the war; that the whole life of Great Britain is dependent upon that trade being built up and continued, because she is dependent financially upon the world trade; that protection of world trade is an assurance of the development of world trade, and that the ability of Great Britain to protect that trade with the one class of naval vessels which is useful equally in war and peace assures the opportunity for British merchants and British enterprise to develop an export trade all over the world. That is the point I am making.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield.

Mr. KING. May I observe to the Senator, though doubtless he is as familiar as I am and perhaps more so, that immediately after the war all of the cruisers which Great Britain had and which antedated 1910 in their construction were relegated to the scrap heap?

Mr. SACKETT. Absolutely.

Mr. KING. And the only cruisers which she now has are about 46, from the Comus down to the Audacious, the former having been laid down in 1910, and the few which have been constructed during the past few years, aggregating about 10 or 11.

Mr. SACKETT. Sixty-four in all laid down and constructed.

Mr. KING. Nine out of the 64 have been retired absolutely. But the point I am trying to make is that the larger part of her cruisers, from the Comus down, those 3,000 tons plus up to 4,000 tons plus, as Mr. Bywater states, are patrol boats for North Sea service, and are not seaworthy. I have his quotation here, but I do not wish, of course, to project myself into the speech of the Senator. The point I am making is that the cruisers of Great Britain, the overwhelming majority in number, are small cruisers, more patrol boats than anything else, and do not serve, as I read the record, the purposes assigned to them by the able Senator.

Mr. SACKETT. I think the Senator will find that those British cruisers are to-day patrolling the lines of trade throughout the world. They are located often in foreign ports as their bases, but they serve as a signal of British protection over their world trade.

We have not anything like the number of their cruisers, and yet to-day the United States has a sea-borne trade greater than that of Great Britain. I want to put into the RECORD at this point some figures which have been given me by the Department of Commerce, which, perhaps, the Members of the Senate have not as yet contemplated. Taking the world trade of Great Britain and of the United States, and segregating that part of the world trade of both countries which is not dependent upon protection on the sea, which would mean, in the case of the United States, the trade with Canada and with Mexico, and in the case of Great Britain, the trade with central Europe, involving merely water carriage across the English Channel, it will be found that for 1927 the foreign trade of the United States, excluding that with Mexico and Canada, was $7,491,594,000, while the foreign trade of the United Kingdom, excluding that with northwest and central Europe, was $6,931,160,000. But when we discuss the need of naval vessels of the cruiser type for the protection of foreign trade, it is not so much the import trade which is important, but it is the export trade which means so much to the life of the country itself.

In exports America had, omitting the trade with Canada and Mexico, a business of $3,919,695,000; while England had, including her export trade with Norway, Iceland, and Denmark, but excluding that with France, Germany, and Austria, a business of $2,962,424,000, nearly a billion less. That is the comparison of the trade valuable to the development of the respective countries which can be aided, assisted, and protected and built up by the use of a proper cruiser fleet. I leave to the "admirals of the Senate"—and they seem to be many in number—the value of such cruisers as an instrument of naval warfare; but I will not yield to the ideas of those same "admirals" as to the value of this cruiser program to American trade and what it means to the prosperity of the country.

Since the World War we have reached the time in the general progress of business in this country when in many lines we have approached the saturation point of demand, and still production is increasing. Not only is agriculture, not only is the bituminous-coal industry to-day suffering from an export surplus, but one after another of the great industries of this country are approaching that condition. We have either got to slow down and make our production the equivalent of the domestic demand or we have got to induce the export of the various commodities which are now reaching the point of saturation by aiding in the development of our foreign trade.

I am going to offer for the RECORD, with the permission of the Senate, tables showing the distribution of our foreign trade. The tables are taken from the report of the Department of Commerce for 1927, and I ask that they may be included in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without the usual reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The tables are as follows:

NOTE.—The total trade of the United States, excluding that with Canada and Mexico, aggregated $7,491,594,000.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, the initiation and development of the foreign trade of the United States is a very delicate business operation. That trade is carried on at tremendous distances from the seat of government. It goes into many lands less developed and less protected than our own. It has to be fostered; it has to be advertised; it requires for its development the residence in foreign countries of many Americans in order to carry out the whole chain of distribution from the producer in this land to the consumer in others. Those engaged in the export trade have to invest large sums of money in order to bring about its full development, and it is only when business feels safe that business is willing to undertake so hazardous an enterprise. The great American foreign commerce, which came to us as a gift of the World War, can be maintained only by keeping open under all conditions the channels of foreign trade; it can be developed only when we are in a position to protect our people who must go to foreign countries in order to establish that trade which means so much to the prosperity and development of America.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SACKETT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. If it is perfectly convenient, I should like to ask the Senator what proportion of our foreign trade is with Central and South America, if the Senator has the figures?

Mr. SACKETT. I can give the Senator from South Carolina the totals of our foreign trade with Central and South America. With Central America our imports amounted to $40,430,000; our exports amounted to $76,348,000. With the West Indies and the Bermudas our imports amounted to $322,000,000 and our exports to $222,000,000, a total of $544,000,000.

In our South American trade imports amounted to $518,000,000, in round figures, and our exports amounted to $438,000,000. That is with the whole of South America. It is divided into the countries of the Caribbean, the east coast, and the west coast. The table shows the figures as to each country, and that is the reason I ask to have it printed in the RECORD, in order that it may be before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. So our trade with South and Central America amounts to something approximating $2,000,000,000?

Mr. SACKETT. It amounts to about $1,000,000,000 for imports and $900,000,000 for exports.

Mr. SMITH. But that trade, both ways, amounts approximately to $2,000,000,000?

Mr. SACKETT. Yes. The point to which I want particularly to call attention of the Senate is the difficulty of maintaining and developing any business at long distance from headquarters, such as the central Government at Washington, unless those who are induced to enter into that business are assured that the business will continue unmolested. The class of vessels which we have now under consideration, apart entirely from their usefulness in time of war and their place as a part of the Grand Fleet, are equally valuable in times of peace to make that assurance of export business double sure.

I was amazed the other day to hear the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] on the floor of the Senate decry the use of the cruiser as an instrument of our naval preparedness. No State in the Union is more dependent upon the continuity of our export trade than is the State of Mississippi with its cotton. The history of the Civil War and the history of the late World War show that the fact that cotton could not seek its normal market across the sea caused more distress and damage to those who produced it than any other feature of the economic situation. We can not expect those who conduct the business of the United States of America in far-off foreign lands to risk their capital, to risk their enterprise in those distant countries unless there stands behind them the assurance of the continuity of trade, unless there stands behind them the assurance of the safety both of capital and labor.

There is no other class of naval craft in which we are to-day in competition with any nation on the earth. The race in armaments of which we hear so much is not a race in the interest of warfare; it is an economic race in the interest of foreign trade. Every one of the products of this country of which we produce a surplus must find an outlet in the markets of the world. I know of no class of products that need the foreign trade which is developed and protected by the use of cruisers in time of peace to a greater extent than do the agricultural products of this country. Unless the wheat which is grown in surplus quantities in America can get into the markets of the world we are going to have a surplus here that will destroy even the present value of that commodity. Unless cotton can be carried into the marts of the world there is no need of producing the quantity of that commodity which is now grown upon our own soil.

Those of us who have been in a foreign port and have seen an American naval vessel enter the harbor can understand in a way how that vessel is in a sense a supersalesman for every American product which is exported. Her arrival becomes a prominent feature on the first page of the local newspaper; attention is drawn to America; comment is made of the increasing American trade, and in that way the great and valuable asset which we hold to-day is assisted and built up by the use of naval vessels in time of peace. It is a matter we do not want to treat lightly, for if we lose our foreign trade, if it is interrupted by wars between other nations—and it would be interrupted unless we had the naval vessels able to protect our own cargoes—that trade is gone for a long period.

Great Britain sees the advantage of protection and the assurance to her merchants engaged in foreign trade which cruisers furnish. Let us not be backward in recognizing that to-day there is an economic race between the two great exporting countries of the world.

I do not favor such an armament as might in any measure be regarded as promoting the likelihood of war between the two great English-speaking nations. The British Admiralty does not object to the building of the cruisers proposed by this bill to be constructed by the United States. The first lord has been quoted upon this floor to that effect, but we have heard coming from others in Great Britain violent objections that we were in a naval race for war purposes. Those objections, however, do not come from the one representative body of the English nation that would have a right to speak on war preparation. They come rather as a deterrent to the United States providing the very class of vessel which the English merchant knows is the one kind of vessel that can hinder the development of his world trade by maintaining the development of the world trade of the United States.

If we lose the ability to dispose of our surplus in the world market, we will find that loss having its effect upon the prosperity of this entire country. Without a world market we can not produce in the quantities to which we are entitled; but with a world market maintained and developed and protected, and with the assurance to the merchants who do the distribution work of that market that they have behind them the influence and the power of the United States, prosperity in this country is aided and confirmed.

CARLISLE COMMISSION CO.

Mr. FESS obtained the floor.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. NYE. I ask unanimous consent to report back favorably, from the Committee on Claims, without amendment, House bill 10774, for the relief of the Carlisle Commission Co., and I submit a report (No. 1612) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to this bill.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I am obliged to leave the floor of the Senate. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from North Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. FESS. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Let it be read, or will the Senator from Missouri tell us what it is?

Mr. REED of Missouri. The bill is to pay a balance due on hay furnished during the war. The Government held back 20 per cent of the price, as they always held it back. They held it back for an indefinite period. The War Department has reported that every part of the contract was carried out and that these men are entitled to their money. The bill has been before the committee of the House, and has been approved. It is an absolutely straight out-and-out debt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the Carlisle Commission Co. the sum of $38,403.43, with interest at 4 per cent from December 17, 1920, to reimburse the said Carlisle Commission Co. for losses incurred by it in the carrying out of certain war contracts calling for the supplying of hay and straw and the furnishing of other services to the forage branch of the War Department, which sum represents the difference between the amount claimed by the Carlisle Commission Co. of $218,903.43 which claim was approved by the War Department claims board, appeals section, on October 25, 1920, and the amount of $180,500 being the sum actually paid the said company by the War Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

THE FIFTEENTH DECENNIAL CENSUS

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HARRIS. The House bill on the calendar to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses has been objected to when the calendar was being considered by unanimous consent by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] because of an amendment which he wished to place in the bill requiring civil-service examinations of enumerators.

Mr. President, about 100,000 of these enumerators will be selected. Their employment will last for only a few days. Many will not stand the civil-service examinations, and in my judgment, we will not get as good men if this plan is insisted upon. I shall place in the RECORD statements from many of the census supervisors 10 years ago, showing the difficulty they had at that time. I also place in the RECORD the tests that are being required of all applicants, so that the Senator from Maryland and other Senators interested in the matter can see just what the Director of the Census is doing in regard to these appointments.

When I was Director of the Census Bureau the present director, Mr. Steuart, was associated with me, and he is one of the most efficient public officials I have known; he is doing everything necessary, and if we allow him to proceed in the way he recommends he will do this work very much better and cheaper than if we handicap him by insisting upon civil-service examinations for enumerators. I am a great believer in the civil service and oppose the spoils system ordinarily, but in this instance it will not be satisfactory.

Enumerators will have to be appointed for each township. Civil-service examinations could only be given in a few central locations. The distance many applicants would have to go for examination, and the consequent expense and loss of time, together with the uncertainty of appointment, would prevent people from taking a test for a job that would last for but 15 to 30 days. This, together with the general dislike for public examinations would keep many excellent prospects from applying, and result in failure to secure applicants in hundreds of districts. The examination would necessarily have to be given some weeks before the appointments would be made, and a considerable percentage of those passing the examination would have secured permanent appointment in the intervening time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to printing in the RECORD the matter referred to by the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COMMENTS TAKEN AT RANDOM FROM THE REPORTS OF VARIOUS SUPERVISORS IN REFERENCE TO PUBLIC TESTS WHICH WERE GIVEN BY THE SUPERVISORS BEFORE THE APPOINTMENT OF ENUMERATORS FOR THE CENSUS OF 1920

Thirteenth Pennsylvania: "Almost invariably those submitting the poorest tests did the best work."

First North Dakota: "Twelve hundred people wrote letters of inquiry, but after receiving the printed matter less than 100 took the examination."

Fourth Maine: "Many excellent people will not take the test for so short a job."

Seventh Massachusetts: "Many excellent enumerators were frightened off by test."

Fourth New York: "Some of my best people passed the poorest tests."

Eighth New York: "Many taking test November 1 had secured work by January 1."

Fifteenth New York: "Many can not pay railroad fare or take the time necessary to go to distant points. For this reason there were often no applicants from certain districts."

Eighth New Jersey: "Some of the best on paper were the worst shirkers in the field."

Third Pennsylvania: "Many enumerators were appointed without a test and these did the best work and proved the most satisfactory. No supervisor should be required to have applicants take examination for so short a job. A pound of instructions is worth a ton of examination."

Third Ohio: "As a gauge of competency the test is practically a failure, as some of the best men will not take the examination for so short a job."

Eighth Ohio: "Best enumerators were obtained by having some responsible person recommend them."

Eighth Indiana: "I am opposed to the test. A competent person will not go through this for so short a job."

Third Illinois: "Only four came to public examination. Rest took it at home."

Fourth Missouri: "Supervisor should be allowed more latitude. People dread a public examination."

Tenth Mississippi: "People as a rule shy of examination unless they lead to something worth while."

Sixth Georgia: "Was forced to beg many to serve as enumerators."

Sixth Minnesota: "Public examination a failure. Applicants would not come so far."

First Iowa: "Failure for lack of applicants."

Fifth Iowa: "Public test proved impractical. Applicants, especially unsuccessful ones, were put to unnecessary expense."

First South Dakota: "Public test failure; lack of applicants."

Second Kansas: "Expense of coming to some central point and the dislike of all examinations keep away many good people."

Sixth South Carolina: "The average applicant will not attend a public examination."

Third Kentucky: "Many able, competent men will not take a test for so short a job."

Fifth Tennessee: "Could not secure applicants for public test."

Tenth Alabama: "People refused to take a competitive examination."

First Mississippi: "Method was a farce. Better enumerators could have been obtained in other ways."

Seventh Louisiana: "A man is needed who knows the roads and the farmers and how to handle them. Some of my worst work was done by men who passed fine examination and some of the best by men who failed."

Second Montana: "It required an unwarranted expenditure of money on the part of the applicant to take a public test."

Second Wyoming: "Public test not practicable owing to distance."

First New Mexico: "Most of them had no examination, and I could not persuade applicants to take them."

Sixth California: "No one will travel several miles to take a test for a 2-week job that he may not even get."

INSTRUCTIONS FOR FILLING OUT THE POPULATION SCHEDULE

1. Note: The following instructions form a part of the detailed instructions which have been prepared and are later to be furnished to the census enumerators for their guidance in the actual work of enumeration in November, 1929. They are given here for the information of applicants for appointment as census enumerators, and should be studied carefully, in connection with the illustrative example, and used in filling out the test schedule.

2. The census day: All returns on the population schedule should relate to the census day, November 1, 1929. Thus persons dying after November 1 should be enumerated, but persons born after November 1 should not be enumerated.

3. Who is to be enumerated in your district: All persons are to be enumerated, in general, at their "usual place of abode" on November 1, 1929. This means the place where they may be said to live or belong, or the place which is their home.

4. As a rule the usual place of abode is the place where a person regularly sleeps. Note, however, that where a man happens to sleep at the time of the enumeration may not be the place where he usually sleeps.

5. The following persons are to be enumerated with the families in your district, and inquiry regarding such persons must be made of every family:

a. Members of the family absent on the census day, either in foreign countries or elsewhere in the United States on business or visiting.

b. Children attending schools or colleges located in other districts.

c. Members of the family who are ill in hospitals or sanatoriums.

d. Servants, laborers, or other employees who live with the family, sleeping on the premises.

e. Boarders or lodgers who have their usual place of abode in the house being enumerated.

6. Every dwelling, store, factory, warehouse, houseboat, and all other places of shelter in which it is possible for persons to reside must be visited and careful inquiry made for persons to be enumerated. Members of railroad, road, or other construction camps, lumber camps, convict camps, and persons on State farms must be enumerated, as well as all inmates of prisons, reformatories, jails, almshouses, insane hospitals, homes for the aged, institutions for orphans, blind, deaf, incurables, and feeble-minded, and soldiers' homes. Soldiers, sailors, and marines, and officers of the Army and Navy of the United States, as well as the resident civilian employees at military and naval stations or camps, must be enumerated at their places of duty.

NARRATIVE

Robert J. Brown, the enumerator of district 10-4 in the 4th supervisor's district of California, began on Tuesday, November 5, 1929, the completion of the enumeration of the village of Buena Vista, being part of the township of Alameda, county of Fresno. He had enumerated 41 families of this village on previous days, having filled two sheets, making this sheet the third.

He began his work on this day at No. 201 Walnut Street, the 42d dwelling house in the order of visitation. The house was occupied by a single family, consisting of George F. Lasalle, his wife Rose, his son George F. Lasalle, jr., and his wife's sister, Mrs. Emma O. Price. George F. Lasalle was born in Canada, of French-Canadian parents, in June, 1890, and came to the United States in 1908, becoming naturalized five years after his arrival. He is the cashier of the First National Bank and owns the house in which he lives, subject to a small mortgage. Mr. Lasalle was in the Marine Corps during the World War.

Rose Lasalle, the wife, was born in England of English parents, and will be 39 years old in February. She has had one child, George F., jr., still living. She came to this country in 1910 and was naturalized in 1915. Mrs. Lasalle has no occupation other than attending to the duties of her household. She reads, writes, and speaks French, English, and German.

George F., the son, was born in October, 10 years ago, in Chicago, Ill. As result of fever when 2 years of age, he is not in good health and, owing to his physical condition, it has not been possible to teach him to read or write. He is able to speak the English language.

Mrs. Price was born in England 40 years ago last September. She married when quite young, but, her husband having deserted her, she obtained a divorce and came to this country with her sister. She is now a bookkeeper in the grocery store of Smith, Brown & Jones, and has taken out her first papers for naturalization.

At house No. 203 Walnut Street there live Jacob Ruckle, his wife Mary M., and a boarder, Jean Marot. Miss Belle Olmstead, 29 years old, of Denver, Colo., is making a short visit to her sister, Mrs. Ruckle.

Jacob's parents came from Switzerland in 1860 and settled in Ohio, where Jacob was born 65 years ago last May. He owns and operates a very prosperous truck farm, on which he employs several laborers. Both farm and house are free of any encumbrance. This is the first farm schedule. He speaks and writes German, English, and French.

Mary M., Jacob's wife, who will be 44 years old the 15th of November, was born in Michigan, in the same village in which her father and mother were born. Mrs. Ruckle keeps the financial accounts of her husband in addition to doing the usual housework.

Jean Marot, unmarried, is a cook in the Delicatessen Restaurant. He is a young Frenchman, and reads, writes, and speaks only his native language. He came to this country in June, 1928, when just 24 years of age. His parents are still living in Lyon, France, where they as well as Jean were born. He is not naturalized.

Next to house No. 203 is a large building in course of construction. Turning around the corner into Lake Avenue there are several vacant lots, the first house being numbered 425 and occupied by two families.

The first and second floors of this house are occupied by Mrs. Eliza M. Justice, a widow, who owns the house, free of any encumbrance. Living with her is her daughter, Mary Hugo, and her husband Jules, their two children, William J., who was 8 years old on February 2 last, and Martha S., who will be 12 months old on November 6, and Lizzie Dunn, a servant.

Mrs. Justice was born in Pennsylvania, Independence Day, 1870, and lived there three years after her marriage. Her father and mother were also natives of that State. She graduated from the State normal school and married, when 25 years old, a native of the State of New Jersey. Mrs. Justice takes general charge of the home, although she does very little of the housework herself.

Mary was born October 21, 1897.

Mary Justice and Jules Hugo, who is exactly three years older, were married in January, 1920, and to them three children have been born, two of whom are living. Mr. Hugo was born in France of French parentage. He came to this country in 1919 and was naturalized in 1926. He is a traveling salesman for the hardware house of Roberts & Lee of New York. Prior to her marriage Mary was a teacher in the public schools, but her household duties now engage her attention, as there is too much work for the servant to do alone.

William J. Hugo was born in New York and is attending the fourth grade school. Martha S. Hugo was also born in New York.

Lizzie Dunn, the servant in the family of Mrs. Justice, is a Negro woman, who says she was 40 years of age on her last birthday, unmarried, and she and her parents were born in Virginia. She has a limited education, being able to read but not to write.

The third floor of house No. 425 is occupied by Jeremiah Mahoney and his sister Charlotte who rent their apartment from Mrs. Eliza M. Justice. Mr. Mahoney was 59 years old on his last birthday and Charlotte, 28. They are both single and were born in Ireland, where their parents were also born. Mr. Mahoney came to the United States in 1926 and has taken out his first papers for citizenship. Miss Mahoney did not come until the next year and has not yet taken out her citizenship papers. Both Mr. and Miss Mahoney are well educated. He is foreman in a coal mine and she is stenographer in an insurance office.

The next house, No. 427, is occupied by a Negro family of the name of Lawson. The family consists of Stephen, his wife, Lily M., and his son, Edward H. They rent their house. Stephen is 27, Lily, 22, and Edward 11, was 4 on July 29. Stephen is a laborer in a nursery and can not read or write. Lily takes in washing. She has a common school education and can both read and write. Stephen was born in Maryland, his father was born in Virginia, and his mother in North Carolina. Lily and her father were born in Delaware, but her mother was born in Maryland. Their little son, Edward, was born in Pennsylvania. The Lawson house is the last home within the corporate limits of Buena Vista village.

NARRATIVE

The enumerator for Jefferson Township, situated in Grant County, and designated as Enumeration District 27-3 in the 9th Supervisor's District of Indiana, began work on the morning of Friday, November 8, at 407 Wilson Street, in the town of Jackson. On the six previous days he had enumerated 250 families, occupying 239 dwellings, which had completely filled 10 sheets, making this the 11th. He had also enumerated 5 farms.

At 407 Wilson Street the enumerator saw Mr. Henry T. Dumond, a World War veteran, who said his family consisted of his wife, himself, and four children. He said he owned the house, on which there was a small mortgage; that he was cashier in the Farmers' Bank. He was born in Annapolis, Maryland, in December, 1887. His father was also born in Maryland but his mother was born in New York. Mrs. Dumond, whose given name is Elizabeth Anne, was born and educated in Indianapolis, Indiana. The children were born in the house where they are now living. Mrs. Dumond's mother was born in Scotland and her father in Illinois. She was 38 on her last birthday. The oldest son, John J., was 14 on his last birthday and was in his second year at high school. Little Henry was 9 on his last birthday and did not go to school. Anne Louise was born on June 20, 1927, and the baby, Joan, was born on November 8, 1929. Mrs. Dumond keeps house and has a servant, but the servant goes home every night.

At 409 Wilson Street the servant said the lady of the house was out but that the husband, Rev. Wm. J. Allen, was in. The enumerator asked to see him. Mr. Allen was very glad to give the information, as he wanted his family correctly enumerated. He said his household consisted of himself, his wife, Margaret Ellen, his adopted son, Julian, and his mother-in-law, Mrs. Mary Lane Palmer. The servant also lived on the premises. Mr. Allen was born in Canada in September, 1870, but came to the United States in 1893 and was graduated from Bowdoin College in 1898. He became a citizen of the United States in 1900, when he was ordained as a minister. He said he was now pastor of the Congregational Church. His father and mother were born in England but came to Canada in 1873, where they are still living. His wife was born in Bath, Maine, in June, 1888, and graduated from the high school there. Her father was born in Massachusetts and her mother in Connecticut. Her mother's parents were born in northern Ireland. After her father's death 5 years ago her mother came to live with Mrs. Allen. Her mother was 65 on her last birthday. She was a great reader and very fond of letter writing. She made her home permanently with them and had general supervision of the house as Mrs. Allen was Secretary of the Y. W. C. A. and had to be away from home all day. Mr. and Mrs. Allen had a married daughter who lived in Boston. Julian, their adopted son, was 19 years of age and was away at college. Julian was born in Indiana and so were his own parents. The servant's name is Jane Brown. She was divorced from her husband 2 years ago; she was 25 on February 2 and can read but not write. She was born in Maryland and her father and mother were born there, too. Jane is colored but apparently has some slight mixture of other blood with the Negro blood. Mr. Allen lives in a parsonage furnished by the church.

The occupants of the next house, No. 411, were a bachelor brother and an unmarried sister, John Andrew White, jr., and Sarah Andrew White, and a roomer, Joseph Cortel. The enumerator saw Miss White, who kept house for her brother, and she said that her father, who lived with them, had died 5 days before on his 91st birthday. He was a retired physician. Both he and his parents were born in Yonkers, N. Y. His given name was John Andrew, too. Her mother was a French-Canadian by birth and had been dead several years. Her brother was the head of the family and owned the house free of debt. He was a building contractor and was 59 years old on his last birthday. He had graduated at the Manual Training High School in Chicago, both he and his sister having been born and educated in Chicago, Ill. Mr. White was a soldier in the Spanish American War and his father was a veteran of the Civil War. Miss White said she did not mind telling her age, that she was 52 on April 1, but she did not want the enumerator to tell her age to anyone, as the neighbors were curious to know whether she or her brother was the older. The enumerator assured her that all the information collected at the census was strictly confidential. Miss White said the roomer, Mr. Cortel, was 28 years old and unmarried. He was born in New Jersey but he did not know where his parents were born, except that they were Americans too. She said he was a clerk in the drug store. Miss White keeps no help.

At the end of the street is a farm of 50 acres which is within the corporate limits of Jackson. It has 2 houses on it, both of which front on Oak Road. Citizens have tried to get the owner of the farm, John E. Mason, who lives in the big house, to subdivide the farm into building lots, but Mr. Mason says he and his father were born on the farm and he expects to die on it. He is proud of the fact that it has belonged to his family, free of encumbrance, for 100 years. His mother was born in Tennessee, and so was his wife, whose name was Katherine Llewellyn before her marriage. Her father was born in Georgia and her mother in Wales. Mrs. Mason was 64 in June and Mr. Mason was 70 on November 7. He farms the land himself. He has one hired man, Jim Hunter, a Negro, who lives with his mulatto wife, Ella, in the small house on the far corner of the farm. While Jim pays no actual rent for the house, he renders service in place of rent. Jim and Ella are both 25 years of age, and can both read and write. Mrs. Mason having taught them. Mr. and Mrs. Mason are highly educated people. Jim was born in Indiana and his parents were born in Maryland, while Ella and her parents were born in Ohio. Ella works for Mrs. Mason, although Mrs. Mason does a good deal of the housework herself. The Masons have no children living at home. Mrs. Mason's niece, Mary Llewellyn Wilson, 16 years old, of St. Louis, Mo., is spending two months with her aunt. This farm completes the enumeration of the town of Jackson.

Where the surname is the same as that of the person in the preceding line do not repeat the name, but draw a horizontal line (———) under the name above, as shown in the illustrative example.

19. Column 6. Relationship to head of family: Designate the head of the family, whether husband or father, widow, or unmarried person of either sex, by the word "Head"; for other members of a family write wife, son, daughter, father, mother, grandson, daughter-in-law, uncle, aunt, nephew, niece, boarder, lodger, servant, etc., according to the particular relationship which the person bears to the head of the family.

20. Column 7. Home owned or rented: This question is to be answered only opposite the name of the head of each family. If the home is owned write "O"; if the home is rented, write "R." Make no entries in this column for the other members of the family.

21. If a dwelling is occupied by more than one family it is the home of each of them, and the question should be answered for each family in the dwelling.

22. Owned homes: A home is to be classed as owned if it is owned wholly or in part by the head of the family living in the home, or by the wife of the head, or by a son, or a daughter, or other relative living in the same house with the head of the family. It is not necessary that full payment for the property should have been made or that the family should be the sole owner.

23. Rented homes: Every home not owned, either wholly or in part, by the family living in it should be classed as rented, whether rent is actually paid or not.

24. Column 8. If owned, free or mortgaged: This question applies only to those homes classed in column 7 as owned homes and not to rented homes. Write "M" for mortgaged and "F" for owned free.

25. All owned homes which are not fully paid for, or upon which there is any encumbrance in the form either of a mortgage or of a lien upon which judgment has been had in a court, are to be reported as mortgaged.

26. Column 9. Does this family live on a farm? Write "Yes" in this column, opposite the name of the head of the family, if the family is living on a farm (as defined in the agricultural instructions), including the families of both farm operators and farm laborers. All persons who live on a farm, whether they work there or not, are to be counted in the farm population. Write "No" in this column if the family is not living on a farm.

27. Column 10. Sex: Write "M" for male and "F" for female.

28. Column 11. Color or race: Write "W" for white; "Neg" for Negro; "In" for Indian; "Ch" for Chinese; "Jp" for Japanese; "Fil" for Filipino; "Hin" for Hindu; "Kor" for Korean. For a person of any other race, write the race in full in this column.

29. A person having any percentage of Negro blood is to be returned as a Negro. Both black and mulatto persons are to be returned as Negroes, without distinction.

30. Column 12. Age at last birthday: This question calls for the age in completed years at last birthday. Remember, however, that the age question, like all other questions on the schedule, relates to November 1, 1929. Thus a person whose exact age on November 1, the census day, is 17 years, 11 months, and 25 days, should be returned simply as 17, because that is his age at last birthday prior to November 1, although at the time of your visit he may have completed 18 years.

31. Ages of children: Take particular pains to get the exact ages of children. In the case of a child not 5 years old, the age should be given in completed months, expressed as twelfths of a year. Thus the age of a child 3 months old should be entered as $\frac{3}{12}$, a child 7 months old as $\frac{7}{12}$, a child 1 year and 3 months old as $1\frac{3}{12}$, a child 3 years and 4 months old as $3\frac{4}{12}$, etc. If a child is not yet a month old, enter the age as $\frac{0}{12}$. But note again that this question should be answered with reference to November 1. For instance, a child who is just a year old on the 5th of November, 1929, should nevertheless be returned as $1\frac{1}{12}$, because that is its age in completed months on November 1.

32. Column 13. Single, married, widowed, or divorced: Write "S" for a single or unmarried person; "M" for a married person; "Wd" for widowed (man or woman); and "D" for divorced.

33. Column 14. Attended school any time since September 1, 1929: Write "Yes" for a person who attended school, college, or any educational institution at any time since September 1, 1929, and "No" for any person of school age—5 to 20 years—who has not attended school since that date. For persons below or above school age, leave the column blank, unless they actually attended school.

34. Column 15. Whether able to read and write: Write "Yes" for a person 10 years of age and over who can read and write in any language, whether English or some other, and "No" for such person who can not both read and write in some language. For persons under 10 years of age, leave the column blank.

35. Column 16. Place of birth of person: If the person was born in the United States, give the State or Territory in which born. The words "United States" are not sufficiently definite. A person born in what is now West Virginia, North Dakota, South Dakota, or Oklahoma should be reported as so born, although at the time of his birth the particular region may have had a different name. Do not abbreviate the names of States and Territories.

36. If the person was born outside the United States, enter the country in which born, as Belgium, France, Hungary, Italy, Lithuania, Norway, Poland, Serbia, Sweden, Denmark, China, Japan, etc., as the case may be.

37. Do not return a person as born in Great Britain but indicate the particular country, as England, Scotland, Wales, etc. Distinction must be made between Northern Ireland and Irish Free State.

38. French Canadians should be distinguished from other Canadians. For a French-speaking person born in Canada, enter Canada-French; for all other persons born in Canada, enter Canada-English (even though they may not actually speak English).

39. If a person was born in Cuba or Porto Rico, so state, and do not write West Indies.

40. If a person was born abroad, but of American parents, write in column 16 both the birthplace and Am. cit.—that is, American citizen. If the person was born at sea, write At sea.

41. Spell out the names of countries, and do not abbreviate in any case.

42. Columns 17 and 18. Place of birth of parents: Enter in columns 17 and 18, respectively, the State or country in which were born the father and the mother of the person whose own birthplace was entered in column 16. In designating the birthplace of the parents, follow the same instructions as for the person himself (see pars. 35 to 41). In case, however, a person does not know the State or Territory of birth of his father (or mother), but knows that he (or she) was born in the United States, write "United States" rather than "unknown."

43. Column 19. Year of immigration to the United States: This question applies to all foreign-born persons, male and female, of whatever age. It should be answered, therefore, for every person whose birthplace was in a foreign country. (See column 16.) Enter the year in which the person came to the United States. If he has been in the United States more than once, give the year of his first arrival.

44. Column 20. Naturalized or alien: This question applies to all foreign-born persons, male and female, of whatever age. It should be answered, therefore, for every person whose birthplace was in a foreign country, as follows:

45. For a foreign-born person (male or female), 21 years of age and over, write—

"Na" (for naturalized), if he or she has become a full citizen, either by taking out second or final papers of naturalization, or, while he or she was under the age of 21 years, through the naturalization of either of the parents, generally the father. (See par. 46.)

"Pa" (for papers), if he or she has declared intention to become an American citizen and has taken out "first papers."

"Al" for (alien), if he or she has taken no step toward becoming an American citizen.

46. A foreign-born child under 21 years of age is to be reported with the same citizenship (naturalized or alien) as the father (or mother if he or she has no father), unless such child has taken out first papers, in which case write "Pa." Note that a person must be at least 18 years of age to take out first papers.

47. Column 21. Whether able to speak English: Write "Yes" for a person 10 years of age and over who can speak English, and "No" for such person who can not speak English. For persons under 10 years of age, leave the column blank.

48. Column 22. Trade or profession: An entry should be made in this column for every person enumerated. The entry should be either (1) the occupation pursued—that is, the word or words which most accurately indicate the particular kind of work done by which the person enumerated earns money or a money equivalent, as physician, carpenter, dressmaker, salesman, newsboy; or (2) none (that is, no occupation). The entry none should be made in the case of all persons who follow no gainful occupation.

49. Persons retired or temporarily unemployed: Care should be taken in making the return for persons who on account of old age, permanent invalidism, or otherwise are no longer following an occupation. Such persons may desire to return the occupations formerly followed, which would be incorrect. If living on their own income, or if they are supported by other persons or institutions, the return should be none. On the other hand, persons out of employment when visited by the enumerator may state that they have no occupation, when the fact is that they usually have an occupation but merely happen to be idle or unemployed at the time of the visit. In such cases the return should be the occupation followed when the person is employed.

50. Persons having two occupations: If a person has two occupations, return only the more important one—that is, the one from which he gets the more money. If you can not learn that, return the one at which he spends the more time.

51. Column 23. Industry: An entry should be made in this column in all cases where the entry in column 22 has been that of an occupation. But where the entry in column 22 is none, leave column 23 blank. The entry, when made, should be the name of the industry or business in which this person works, as coal mine, dry-goods store, bank. Never enter in this column such indefinite terms as mine, store, "Jones & Co.," etc. (See also examples in par. 64.)

52. Women doing housework in their own homes: In the case of a woman doing housework in her own home or supervising such work done by servants, and having no other employment, enter in column 22 "Housework" or "Home supervision," as the case may be, and in column 23 "Own home."

53. Where a woman not only looks after her own home, but also has employment outside or does work at home for which she receives payment, the outside work or gainful employment should ordinarily be reported as her occupation, unless this takes only a very small fraction of the woman's time, in which case she should be returned as indicated in paragraph 52.

54. If two or more women do housework in the home and have no other employment, make the entry, as directed, for each one. It is not intended, however, that grown daughters or relatives living in the family and simply helping with the housework for a short time each day should be given the occupational designation "Housework" or "Home supervision." For such persons the entry in column 22 should be "None," and column 23 should be left blank.

55. Women doing housework for wages: A woman doing housework for wages should be returned in column 22 as housekeeper, servant, cook, or chambermaid, as the case may be; and the entry in column 23 should state the kind of place where she works, as private family, hotel, or boarding house.

56. If a woman, in addition to doing housework in her own home, regularly earns money by some other occupation, whether pursued in her own home or outside, that occupation should be returned in columns 22 and 23. For instance, a woman who regularly takes in washing should be reported as laundress or washerwoman, followed in column 23 by at home.

57. Children working for parents: Children who work for their parents at home merely on general household work, on chores, or at odd times on other work, should be reported as having no occupation. Those, however, who somewhat regularly assist their parents in the performance of work other than household work or chores should be reported as having an occupation.

58. Avoid general or indefinite terms: Give the occupation and industry precisely. For example, return a worker in a coal mine as foreman—coal mine; laborer—coal mine; teamster—coal mine; etc., as the case may be.

59. The term "laborer" should be avoided if any more precise designation can be secured, as foreman, inspector, watchman, etc. Where the term "laborer" is used, be careful to state accurately the industry or business in column 23.

60. Avoid in all cases the use of the word "mechanic," but give the exact occupation, as carpenter, painter, machinist, etc.

61. Distinguish carefully between retail and wholesale merchants, as retail merchant—dry goods; wholesale merchant—dry goods.

62. An employee in a store engaged in selling goods should be called a salesman, and not a clerk. A stenographer, typewriter, bookkeeper, or cashier, etc., should be reported as such, and not as a clerk.

63. Distinguish a traveling salesman from a salesman in a store; the former preferably should be reported as a commercial traveler.

64. Illustrations of how to return occupations:

Column 22	Column 23	Column 22	Column 23
Civil engineer	Railroad.	Salesman	Dry goods store.
Carpenter	Shipyard.	Janitor	Apartment house.
Blacksmith	Own shop.	Locomotive engineer	Steam railroad.
Cook	Hotel.	Lawyer	General practice.
Servant	Private family.	Teamster	Farm.
Cashier	Bank.	Agent	Insurance.
Laborer	Coal mine.	Spinner	Silk mill.
Stationary engineer	Lumber mill.	Clerk	Bank.
Teacher	Public school.	Mixer	Bakery.
Machinist	Steel mill.	Trimmer	Bookbindery.
Housework	Own home.	Home supervision	Own home.

65. Column 24. Veterans: Write "Yes" for a man who is an ex-service veteran of any United States war or expedition, and "No" for a man who is not a veteran. No entry is to be made in this column for males under 21 years of age or for females of any age whatever.

66. Column 25. What war or expedition: Where the answer in column 24 is "Yes," give the name of the war or expedition in which the man served, as World War, Spanish-American War, Civil War, Philippine insurrection, Boxer rebellion, Mexican expedition, etc.

67. Column 26. Number of farm schedule: If the head or any member of the family operates a farm, enter in this column the number of the agricultural schedule filled out for that farm. Make this entry opposite the name of the member of the family operating the farm.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. FESS. For what purpose?

Mr. BRUCE. To reply, in two or three sentences, to what has been said by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FESS. I can not yield for a speech, Mr. President.

Mr. BRUCE. I was not asking the Senator to yield for a speech, but simply that I might make a very brief reply to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. FESS. I will yield to the Senator, but not for a speech.

Mr. BRUCE. I thank the Senator.

I simply wanted to say that I do not think that the Senator from Georgia has exhibited exactly his usual fairness in making the statement that he did a few moments ago. The Senator well knows that the census of 1910 was taken pursuant to such methods as my amendment proposes. That is to say, it was taken in some respects by a corps of field agents selected in conformity with the merit system of appointment. It is generally admitted, so far as my reading goes, that that was one of the most accurate and satisfactory censuses ever taken in the history of the country.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter from a retired bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church who has written upon the subject of the cruiser bill, and who makes a very clear statement of the position of those who are opposed to it. It appears that his view is that the cruiser bill is starting a rivalry on the sea that we thought had been ended by the Washington conference; and it also appears that his view is that we will not feel entirely safe unless we have ship for ship, gun for gun, and so forth.

I am of the opinion that the bishop has made a pretty clear statement of the view of those who up to this stage have been opposing the cruiser bill. In fact, the early part of the propaganda was in opposition to both the bill and the time limit. The more recent propaganda is dropping opposition to the bill, and is now directed specifically to the time limit. I do not mean that all persons who had opposed the bill are withdrawing their opposition; but at this time the vocal opposition, so far as I get it, is to the time limit.

Our colleague from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] dealt with what I regard as the most concrete single fact in the argument, and that is the growing friction that can not be avoided in two great countries that are bound to be, to an increasing extent, rivals in their foreign commerce. In what I am about to say with regard to Great Britain I want it distinctly understood that there is not any Member of the Senate who has a greater admiration for what she has accomplished than I have. In fact, most of my intellectual life has been spent in reading history, especially our own history, with a background of that of Great Britain; and when I speak of these facts they are not intended to be offensive in the least. Certainly that is not my purpose.

It is well known that about 80 per cent of the activity of the British Empire is devoted to overseas trade. That trade has been built up over a period of about 200 years; and Great Britain's achievement up to this time has been the wonder of civilization. Her coaling stations are so located that to-day one of her freighters with her bunkers filled with coal can scarcely be found in any civilized part of the globe from which that freighter can not reach a British coaling station before the coal is exhausted. Great Britain has her naval stations or bases so placed that she commands every sea upon which commerce floats. She has an open port in every country where trade is going on, and, in addition, she has command of most of the cables. Besides this, to meet this demand for trade on the sea, she has a merchant marine that to-day carries a large part of our own trade, a good portion of which at least we ought to carry ourselves.

In this organization for overseas trade Great Britain finds her chief activity; and while she is now suffering with a great unemployment problem with which every American has sympathy, she looks for relief of that problem to the increase of this her chief activity of overseas trade.

As the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] said, Great Britain's foreign trade has now reached the enormous figure of $10,000,000,000 annually; but she has been building up that trade for 200 years and during the last few years it has grown by leaps and bounds. On the other hand, only a fraction of the activity of the United States is devoted to foreign commerce; but, while it has been growing only a short time, the overseas commerce of the United States is rapidly approaching the figure of Great Britain and in less than five years without doubt will easily pass it.

I am reminded of the eloquent words of Mr. Gladstone in 1873 in an article that appeared in the North American Review, where, speaking of the two countries engaged in trade, he made this statement:

> Oh, brave mother! Oh, braver daughter! You have passed us in a canter.

And then he made that remarkable utterance that has been quoted a thousand times:

> As the British constitution is the most subtle instrument, so the American Constitution is the most wonderful instrument ever stricken off by the brain or purpose of man at any one time.

That statement was made after his comment upon the rapid growth of the United States; and when we remember that but a fraction of the activities of the American Republic are devoted to a foreign commerce that in time is going far to outrun that of the mother country, and that a large percentage of the mother country's activity is devoted to her foreign commerce, there is not any question but that in the future there will be more or less friction between the two great friends belonging to the Anglo-Saxon race. I do not mean that that friction will result in war; farthest from it. I have no conception that the friction will ultimately lead us to war; but there is the promise of friction that may give us some concern.

My beloved colleague [Mr. BURTON], who never speaks without being heard and appreciated on two continents, a moment ago made the statement that it is perfect folly to think of a strained relation that might lead to war between Great Britain and the United States. He said it is a farce. I am rather of the opinion that while that is an extreme statement, it has some basis; but I do not want Senators to forget that in 1914, 1915, 1916, and 1917 we had our chief dispute, not alone with Germany, but with Britain, our great friend.

I happened to be a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House at the time, and the two things that were disturbing us as a Nation were, first, the incursions upon our rights by German submarines, and, second, the restrictions upon our rights by the British Admiralty. I was asked at that time to compile for the committee the documents detailing the dispute between us and Germany in regard to the submarines, and, on the other hand, the documents detailing the dispute between us and Britain in regard to restraints of trade.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand now a document of 200 pages, all devoted to the orders of the British council, and our protests, officially signed by the two Secretaries of State, Mr. Bryan and Mr. Lansing. These protests were vigorous, in language which sometimes looked as if it approached the belligerent.

One of the reasons for the difficulty was the freedom with which the mother country, the United Kingdom of Great Britain, would change the rule as to what were items of contraband. We were proceeding under international law, and Article XXVIII fixes the articles that are permitted not to be contraband. The provision was:

> The following may not be declared contraband of war:

The word "may" in international law is equivalent to a command.

"Raw cotton." Yet cotton was made contraband.

"Wool." Wool was made contraband.

"Silk." That was omitted.

"Jute." As I recall, that was not put on the list.

Flax was, hemp was, and here is a list, printed in this volume, of three and a half pages of items put on the contraband list, not included originally under international law. We protested on the ground that the action in putting various articles on the list of contraband was totally in violation not only of international agreement but in violation, distinctly, of neutral rights on the sea, with special reference to our own country. That was one of the sources of constant friction, and was the occasion for many of these protests.

At one time the protests went to such an extent that we passed a resolution to protect foreign trade, that was not only aimed at Germany, but at any other country that was belligerent. In that resolution we gave to the President, by act of this body in conjunction with the House, the power to use the Army and the Navy to protect our rights. That was in 1915.

The point I raise is that, with the inevitable friction that will grow out of more or less dispute in time of war, it is not safe to say that we are wholly exempt from any danger of war.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator will also recall that the Congress passed what is known as the armed neutrality act, expressly authorizing merchant ships to arm for their own protection while engaged in the commerce of the United States.

Mr. FESS. I remember that very distinctly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The passage of that act came some months prior to our entry into the war.

Mr. FESS. Yes; that is true. What I want to impress upon the Members of the Senate is that, while nations are friendly, and are organized against war, we are not certain that in times of stress questions will not arise, and that they might eventuate into difficulty.

There is another consideration which I think is worthy of our thought at this time. The United States has always shown her faith in trying to induce nations to limit their armaments below the point where there would be danger of aggression. That has been one of the ambitions of this Nation.

When President Wilson was in the thickest of the fight, one of his cardinal principles, major in its purpose, was to induce the nations to agree upon some basis for a limitation of armaments, not alone as a saving from the burdens of war but especially to lessen the chances of war. One of the specific provisions of the covenant of the League of Nations was to set in motion the machinery ultimately to result in a limitation of armament on land and sea. It is certainly obvious to everyone who has followed the efforts of the League of Nations that that has been one of the special activities the special committees of the league have been working on. They have had several conferences on it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The preparatory commission has been unable to agree even on a program for disarmament for consideration by the League of Nations.

Mr. FESS. A very pertinent remark, which is accurate. In addition to what the league has been attempting, the United States was willing to undertake to lead in limitation of arms, and in connection with the Army we did not feel that it was necessary for us to wait for Europe to join us. We proceeded to reduce our Army, as every Member of the Senate knows. When the recommendation was made for a rather large Army, something over 500,000, we cut it to 180,000 at the very first session of Congress after the war. Then, when we considered it subsequently, we cut it a second time to 150,000, and finally we have gotten it down to a very low point of 127,000. During this time we have not been waiting for Europe to join us, but we have been making our purpose clear that it would be our wish that they should join in the same movement.

Europe came with this sort of a proposal, that unless a security treaty could be effected whereby nations which might be invaded would have the help of other nations in case of invasion, they must not be required to reduce their armies; and in the failure to secure those treaties the armies were not reduced, although we proceeded, showing our good faith, in the limitation of our Army to the minimum.

I recall that the Cannes conference of 1920, I think it was, or 1921, recommended a form of limitation of security, with four nations joining—Great Britain, France, Italy, and Belgium. But France rejected the proposal, after a change of ministry, when Briand was superseded by Poincaré.

Then, after that, came what we know as the Genoa conference. But the nations failed to get together because of dispute over what was to be done with the Russian delegates, a dispute between the former allies and the former central powers.

That was followed by the notable Geneva conference which published the Geneva protocol. That consisted of the nations mentioned before and a fifth member, namely, Japan; but because of a dispute over shipping Britain rejected the proposed agreement. So that up to 1925 there were four efforts in Europe to induce conferences to reach a plan of limitation, and every one of them failed.

Then came the Locarno conference. There was a proposal of a security treaty, and it was signed and ratified. When that was done there was an effort to get another conference to move in the direction of general limitation, and we know what the result was. Nothing has been done in the way of the limitation of armies, although a lack of a security treaty was given as a reason why there was not any limitation. From 1925 to this time, instead of the nations limiting their armies, the armies are gradually increasing in size.

It is rather a hopeless, vain effort on the part of peace-loving people to seek to have the dangers of war reduced, it seems to me. The United States has about lost any hope that its dream may come true.

In 1927 a conference was called in Geneva, first in February, then later in midsummer, along about July, and ending, I think, in August. That was the famous conference in which our effort to induce the naval powers to complete what the naval limitation conference held here at Washington did not complete.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator has omitted to state that in that conference only three naval powers were willing to join. The other principal naval powers even refused to participate.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator for correcting the omission. France and Italy withdrew, and refused to go on, and it was left to the United States, Britain, and Japan.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And they could not agree upon any program or agenda for consideration in the conference, or plan of limitation, and the conference wholly failed.

Mr. FESS. That is true, it was a total failure. My colleague [Mr. BURTON], who was in Europe at the time of that conference, not at the conference, but close to where it was held, and following what it was doing, admitted, speaking of it a moment ago, that it was a total failure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Later, when the preparatory commission of the League of Nations was attempting to form a program for consideration with respect to the limitation of naval armament, two of the great powers, France and Great Britain, entered into an agreement which was known to be repugnant to the United States, namely, an agreement to contemplate a limitation as to large cruisers, and practically no limitation as to small cruisers, and no limitation as to submarines.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Great Britain wanted a very large number of small cruisers suitable for her purpose, her naval bases being scattered throughout the seas, and small cruisers being deemed especially adapted to the protection of British commerce, while she was anxious to limit the larger cruisers, with the greater capacity for navigation. France was utterly unwilling to enter into any effective limitation as to submarines. So, up until the present time, with every nation in the world professing its readiness to limit armament, and with all the executives of the principal nations calling or joining in conferences for that purpose, nothing whatever has been accomplished, and while we have stood still with respect to the building of cruisers, the other nations have gone forward as if a competition actually existed.

Mr. FESS. I thank the Senator for saying what I was going to say.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I apologize to the Senator for anticipating him.

Mr. FESS. He said it a good deal better than I would have said it. It is the thing I had in mind and I was ready to make the statement that in view of our efforts and our successive failures—not successful, but successive failures—in trying to induce the powers to agree on limitation, what is the common-sense view for a Senator to take to-day facing this problem? When we had it up before and the conference of 1927, which the Senator just mentioned, was in the offing, I opposed going on with the cruiser program, and especially the time limit, because I thought that certainly there would be a disposition on the part of those two countries with which we had had agreements in Washington back in 1922 to go on and apply to the cruisers or auxiliary ships the ratio that had been applied to capital ships in 1922.

I opposed going on with the cruiser program at that time for that reason. And yet that conference was held, our proposals were rejected, and anybody who will read the proceedings of either that conference or of the council of the League of Nations in their efforts to secure disarmament and see the complications that arose and who would still have any hope of securing an agreement without our being in a position to command it, has more confidence than I have. As a Senator who was opposed to the cruiser program when we were awaiting a conference on limitation that was yet to meet, with that conference adjourned after the rejection of our plan, and remembering the manner in which our proposal had been spurned, I do not hesitate for a second to say that it seems to me that there is no alternative for me as a responsible Senator in this body.

It is not because we want to be warlike. We will use every effort and every ounce of influence that we have to induce those countries to agree to a ratio. The ratio agreed to in 1922 limiting capital ships, was applauded around the world; and yet people did not observe that that was only a partial limitation. When we found that the capital ships were limited and all nations respected the limitation, we also found that other nations immediately began to build auxiliary cruisers; so that with our standing still, our disparity in defense was soon as great as it had been in capital ships before we began the building program. With those countries, parties to the limitation agreement for a ratio of 5–5–3, now in the midst of the program of building while we are standing still, instead of the ratio being 5–5–3, we are a poor third in the form of auxiliary battleships that will put us to as much of a disadvantage as if it were in battleships.

With that situation facing us, with the assurance that there is no desire on the part of those countries to meet the ratio, there is only one thing for me to do, if I follow my best judgment. We have asked Great Britain to reduce a certain tonnage, permitting us to go up to a certain tonnage. We originally proposed 100,000 tons increased tonnage for us, and asked Great Britain to reduce 143,000 tons. Britain refused to do it. I am not in position to charge it against her for not doing it. It may be that her overseas situation would require it. If she can not come down for any reason, then should we not go up, or should we rest in the belief that only those who are unprepared to defend themselves are safe?

I can not rest on any such basis as that, and it is not because our Nation is warlike, because it is not warlike. I defy anybody to show where America has ever been the aggressor.

She has not been. This country is the most altruistic country in the history of the world. In 1898 we were in a war which we tried to avoid with Spain, with no great test in the contest. When the war was ended this Nation turned Cuba over to her own control, under our regulation for a time to give her opportunity to establish herself, and then she was given full control of her own affairs. While we did not have any basis or obligation to do what we did to Spain in the matter of the Philippines, we turned and made her a gift of $20,000,000. Is there any aggression there?

See what we did in the Panama Canal matter. We built the canal. We expended $400,000,000 to build it. The world wanted us to keep it open, open in time of war not only to merchant ships but to warships; and, although some people think it was doubtful wisdom, we even put every nation of the world on an equality with ourselves to use that canal as we use it, on the theory that we were marrying the oceans for the trade of the world and not for our own protection. I defy history to show a record of greater cosmopolitan philanthropy than that.

I recall what every Senator recalls, the Boxer difficulty. In 1900, when the time was ripe for China to be carved up and the armies of Europe were located in China, had it not been for the President of the United States, China would have been carved up; but we stated that if there shall be any indemnity, that indemnity is not to be at the expense of the integrity of China. We took the millions of dollars that were our portion of the indemnity and returned them to China for the purposes of education. It was not only the President but it was the American Congress that wanted to do it.

And yet we are charged with being aggressive, charged with being a Shylock, charged with being a dollar Nation that loves nothing but the dollar. That charge is not true. It is not well founded.

Our Nation, on the other hand, has no desire to interfere with any other nation's rights. All we want is to have the same open field in the pursuit of our development, without interfering with any other people, that other nations claim for themselves. In view of the fact that it is just as inevitable as that we are here that the growing commerce of the future will produce friction, it is not unwise for us to be put in the same position of parity to defend ourselves in case of dispute. It is not conceivable, under the modern impetus of science and communication, where all the world is but a neighbor to-day, that these ancient civilizations, these seething populations which up to date have little consuming power, will always remain so. Just as certain as that we are here the millions of China and the millions of India and the hundreds of thousands of population that have heretofore not been productive in a great sense and therefore not consumptive will, under the impetus of new principles of industry introduced, become not only great producers, but will become great consumers.

It is as certain as that the sun will rise that there will be great trade between the Occident and the Orient, that now is in its infancy, and the United States and Great Britain are the two countries that will be engaged in that trade, and while I do not think that rivalry between the two nations will inevitably reach war, yet I am sure it will inevitably reach the point of friction. It is bound to do that. It is not a case of war preparation for us to be anxious to get Britain, our competitor, to agree to be on about the same basis of defense as we are.

When we speak about the peace pact we must all remember that it exempts self-defense, and as Britain increased her contraband list in time of the World War on the basis of self-defense, who is it in this Chamber that can logically claim the time might not come that Britain would insist that our growing merchant marine is impinging upon her self-defense, because as we take from her she might claim we are increasing her problems of unemployment and the maintenance of her integrity. I do not claim that that will happen, but it might happen.

So, Mr. President, looking the thing over from one end to the other, speaking as a man who has always stood for movements for peace, and certainly as peaceable as it is possible for one to be, I think the only common-sense view to take of the measure is that if we can not get our competitor to come down to our ratio by our going up a little, then we are left with no alternative except to go up to her basis. That is not in the interest of war. That is in the interest of peace, for a peaceful nation is never so secure from war as when it is in a position to command its peace. For that reason I shall not only vote for the cruiser bill but I shall vote to retain the time-limit provision in the cruiser bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it is late. I had intended to speak at some length on a phase of the question which has not yet been discussed, but hoping that I may be able to have something to say during the time limit on debate, I shall content myself this afternoon with calling attention to certain elements which are involved in the question of the development of our trade and in our national defense.

I think perhaps it may have been psychologically—if I may use that term—unwise for us to have brought up the question of the construction of these cruisers so soon after the action of this body in ratifying by a very large vote the Kellogg peace treaty. We may believe that the building of the proposed additional number of cruisers is not incompatible with our sincerity in ratifying the peace treaty, but our action is susceptible of a very sinister construction by those who have not our viewpoint and may not believe as we believe. I should have preferred at least to have deferred action on this question until such time as certain indicated conferences and meetings had taken place and we had ascertained the result. However, the question is here; it is before us, and is to be decided.

For one I do not see that the construction of these cruisers and the purpose for which we openly and aboveboard avow we are constructing them in any way conflicts with the immemorial stand of America in reference to war. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has said—and I think the statement is not subject to successful contradiction—we have never been since the establishment of this Republic an aggressor, and are not so even in this attempt adequately to protect our commerce abroad. That effort has my hearty support; but there is a phase of the question affecting the manner in which we are proposing to provide for what is termed "national defense" which has not been brought to the attention of the Senate.

I asked the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] if he had the figures as to our export and import trade with South and Central American countries. According to what he stated, and to my previous information, that trade represents about one-third of our total import and export business; yet, Mr. President, in view of the conditions that exist, it is a startling thing to find that on 3,000 miles of the Atlantic seaboard we have not a single facility either for defense or for the care and protection of vessels of the merchant marine and their convoys, the cruisers and other naval vessels which might be called upon to safeguard our world-wide commerce. South of Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border—a distance of approximately 3,000 miles—there is not a single Government facility equipped to take care of either a merchant ship or of a cruiser if disaster should overtake them either in the Gulf of Mexico, the South Atlantic, or the Caribbean Sea.

In case of need they would have to be towed more than a thousand miles around the most dangerous point on our whole Atlantic seaboard—Cape Hatteras, known as the "boneyard of the Atlantic."

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to certain facts furnished me by the Navy Department. I have a letter from the Chief of Naval Operations of the United States Navy, in which he states:

> Referring to the information which you have requested, for use in connection with the speech which you expect to make on the cruiser bill, I am inclosing an outline chart of the world which shows the various United States and British naval facilities in the West Indies and vicinity.
> The actual coast-line distance from Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border is 2,645 miles.

I want this statement and those figures emphasized and put in italics in the report that will be made of what I am saying.

> The actual coast-line distance from Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border is 2,645 miles; the actual distance from Cape Hatteras to Portsmouth, N. H., is 530 miles.
> Amounts appropriated for public works at east coast navy yards from the 1st of July, 1919, to the 30th of June, 1929, were as follows:
>
> (a) North of Hatteras, $6,511,370.

A distance, remember, of 530 miles.

> (b) South of Hatteras, $1,215,000.

The only navy yard south of Hatteras in existence to-day is at Charleston, S. C., and he informs me that—

> The navy yard at Charleston, S. C., is not at present equipped to build a 10,000-ton light cruiser, such as is contemplated in the present cruiser bill. It is estimated that it would cost about $2,000,000 to equip the Navy yard for this purpose.

North of Hatteras we have 7 navy yards and 18 dry docks, costing approximately $1,000,000,000. I desire to put in the RECORD the figures as to the annual expenditure on those yards and dry docks. From the time of the establishment of these stations to June 30, 1928, during the whole history of our so-called program of national defense, including preparation for invasion and the defense of our coast, there has been expended along 530 miles of seacoast $852,976,000.

There is a map which I have caused to be hung on the rear wall of the Senate Chamber, to which I desire to direct the attention of Senators. From Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border [indicating on map] a distance of approximately 3,000 miles, we have expended in all the history of our preparedness measures, in all the history of our program of defense, $82,000,000.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, have not some of the battleships and cruisers of the Navy been named after some of the States and cities of the South?

Mr. SMITH. I think that has been done, and for that we are profoundly thankful, but they scrapped the one which was named after Charleston, and returned the silver service that the State of South Carolina had presented in recognition of having a battleship named after the State.

I desire, however, to call attention to another fact. Let Senators bear in mind that a billion dollars has been expended on 530 miles of coast line and $82,000,000 on 3,000 miles.

Mr. WHEELER. That emphasizes how much is thought of the section of the country from which the Senator comes; that is all.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. President, we talk about national defense; we are about to spend a quarter of a billion dollars in building additional cruisers as aids, it is said, to the development of our commerce, and where is it proposed to spend this enormous sum of money? There was a controversy on the floor of the Senate the other day as to whether it was not proper, in recognition of the rights of all the people, to divide the building of the proposed cruisers on a basis of 50-50, so that half of them could be constructed by private yards and the other half by navy yards, showing that we were recognizing the right of distribution in the expenditure of this vast sum of money, and in order that financially the benefit might accrue more equitably to the people in various sections of the United States, even in a matter involving adequate defense.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. Is it not a fact that one of the reasons some are giving is that they want to build the cruisers in that way so that they can take up the slack and make times more prosperous in some of the States where unemployment exists?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, you and I know that such a thing could not possibly have occurred had not up to the present time the question of our national defense been a question of sectional pork barrelism. Any great government having the responsibility of providing an adequate national defense would not otherwise have congested in 530 miles of seacoast practically the entire amount appropriated for the purpose of adequately equipping and defending our coast line.

Mr. WHEELER. Is there not a navy yard in South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH. Let me read some figures as to that. I can state them in the rough. Of all the navy yards, only one, that at Charleston, is in a stand-by condition. A certain commission was appointed for the purpose of investigating what navy yards could be economically abandoned. That commission named about three, and preeminent among those three was the only one from Cape Hatteras to the Mexican border.

I am not standing here alone selfishly pleading that this manifest political method of providing for national defense may be wiped out; but as the great Republican Party during the 60 years of its existence has proclaimed itself to be the great national party and has claimed that in an unsectional manner and unselfishly it is trying adequately to meet the responsibilities of a national party, how does it happen that, including about two navy yards on the long western coast and one down below Cape Hatteras, we have in the aggregate on the great coasts on the west, on the south, and on the southeast, appproximating 5,000 miles, about three facilities for taking care of naval vessels as against eight in the 500 miles north of Cape Hatteras, on which there have been expended a billion dollars?

Mr. WHEELER. I assume now, since the South went Republican at the last election, that some of the cruisers will be built at the Charleston Navy Yard, and some new navy yards will be provided in the South.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, every speech made here has been based on the right and proper and patriotic ground that with the rapid development of the facilities and resources of this country, our commerce is expanding likewise; that ultimately we will become the granary and the predominant manufacturing center of the world; that no matter how rapidly our population may increase, it can not increase faster than our manufactured and agricultural and stock production. We have not even touched the border of the possibilities of America's industries, both natural and artificial; and what have we done to prepare, in the first place, for the outgoing of this wonderful commerce that is now in process of development? It does not take a prophet to see what 10 or 15 years may bring forth. What have we done to facilitate the export of this vast volume of goods that is piling up?

What happened in the World War?

Mr. BROOKHART. We sold our Government ships; I remember that.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator says we sold our Government ships. Yes; that was a part of the program. But during the World War, when it became evident that we were going to send millions of men abroad, and we not only had to feed and protect and equip and transport them but we had in the main to provide for feeding and sustaining the European armies that we had joined with to save the world for democracy, what happened?

Every Senator here knows that the North Atlantic ports were so congested that the loaded cars could not be gotten in, nor the empties out. Actually, there was coal on coal cars in the port of New York that had the November snow on it along in March and April. The ships could not get sufficient coal for their bunkers. The foodstuffs piled up, as Senators all know, and vast quantities of them were lost. Why? Because we had developed only that little coterie of congested ports, and it was the neck of a bottle that was totally unable to take care of the vast volume of business that was necessary to meet the exigencies of the case.

Immediately the cry came to make available the ports down in the South Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, not subject to be frozen during the winter, but open the year around. Provision was made to install the proper facilities at Wilmington. A great yard was projected at Philadelphia, known as Hog Island, and one of practically equal size at Charleston, S. C.

Mr. WHEELER. It was properly named Hog Island, was it not?

Mr. SMITH. From all indications, perhaps it was. For some reason, however, after the soundings had been taken and the excavations made and the foundations prepared for the great dry dock at Charleston, that is as far as it ever went; but all of those that had been projected in the North Atlantic section, even after the war was over, ultimately went through.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the Senator object now to building cruisers to keep those places filled all the time?

Mr. SMITH. It is not a question of that. I am calling attention at this juncture to the fact that, no matter how many cruisers we may build, any trouble in the South Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, or the Caribbean Sea will entail the possible loss of a vessel, or an unconscionable expense to tow it from there around the bone yard of the Atlantic, where the shoals run out for more than 200 miles, and cause a dangerous sea even in the most profound calm. It is necessary to tow around that part of the coast in order to get vessels into these facilities, the only ones provided. If enemy vessels were down here, our whole shipping would be at their mercy so far as any convenient place to repair any damage that may be done is concerned.

Now, what does this part of our country face?

The South Atlantic and the Gulf face the Caribbean Sea, the Isthmus of Panama, and the much-spoken-of Nicaraguan canal, the only possible highways of commerce between the Orient and American shores. Nature has provided that the gateway shall be across this isthmus, cutting off the disastrous and dangerous trip around Cape Horn, the whole length of the South American coast. Nature, with the ingenuity of man, has provided that this isthmus may be opened up, and vessels may pass through. Then they are in the South Atlantic, the Caribbean, or the Gulf, and there is not a facility or any accommodation whatever within 1,500 miles of this great gateway of commerce where vessels engaged in war may be repaired.

All of us know that if ever there comes a war of aggression against America, the battle will be fought in and around those gateways to the Orient. We all know it; and yet we have not a facility south of Hatteras by which we could protect the commerce that comes through those gateways, or that seeks any repairs once the vessels are through.

The Navy Department has furnished me a map which I should like to show to those who are interested in this matter. There is a feature of it to which I wish to call attention.

Here is our coast-line, beginning at Portsmouth, N. H., runing around, going down through the Gulf of Mexico; and here is the South American continent. Of course this will cut off any vessels coming from the Orient. Will you observe that nest of eggs. Those are the navy yards and dry docks on the Atlantic seaboard.

Mr. BROOKHART. All of those are right up close around Wall Street; are they not?

Mr. SMITH. Right in one little spot, here are eight.

Mr. WHEELER. Those are close to Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts?

Mr. SMITH. To be sure. This map was furnished to me by the Navy Department. Those are all there are. If you will notice, England has more respect for her trade down there than we have for ours. Look at the coaling and naval stations that the foreigners have in and around that neck of the woods.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let me suggest to the Senator that if the southern Senators will join those of us from the Northwest, we will clean out that nest of eggs.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want to call attention now to just one little matter that is significant. A Senator told me this morning—I do not want this to be considered a criticism of the efficiency of Senators, or their equipment for discharging their senatorial duties—that he had heard it said that you had to carry some water along in tubs and buckets in order to have water enough to get into Charleston. Mark you, he said that when every man who knows enough about his country to be here pretending to represent it knows that there is not a finer harbor on all the Atlantic seaboard than the harbor of Charleston. She did have an unfortunate physical difficulty in what is called the bar; but the Government, years ago, built what are known as jetties, and the erosion of the tide coming in and going out, confined to the small space between the jetties, has so deepened the channel that I myself, in the last few years, have seen the American fleet come in and go out of that harbor under its own steam.

Mr. WHEELER. I think they had reference to Newport News, down in Virginia.

Mr. SMITH. Let us not stir that up right now. I would rather have that held in abeyance for a while.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I did not catch the Senator's remark.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator need not inject it now.

The dry dock at Charleston is the only one on the South Atlantic. The dock formerly at New Orleans was a floating dock, and it has been sold. The one at Pensacola was also disposed of and carried up North somewhere. Some of the cruisers we now have—those of the old type that have the old-fashioned curved bow and stern—could come into the Charleston dry dock and be repaired; but these new cruisers, though not very much greater in length, have no curvature at bow and stern. They are perfectly straight. Therefore one of these cruisers coming to that dry dock could not be accommodated, because the dry dock was built with terraces or steps to accommodate the old curvature.

I want to make one more observation before I close for the day. When the Senate convenes on Monday, if I am physically able, I will endeavor to finish what I have to say in reference to this matter; but I should like those who have been listening to me to give their attention at this time to this statement:

The engineers made a survey of this dock at the Charleston yard, and they found that by extending the back end of it 35 or 40 feet, at a cost of $300,000, it would accommodate these new cruisers. That yard, as everyone knows, is the best-equipped yard in the country for the character of work it does and can do. I shall take occasion on Monday to read the testimony of admirals and other naval officers who have had occasion to use that yard as to the excellence of its work; but in view of the pendency of this cruiser bill I asked for an extension of 30 feet. It did not require the building of any caissons. All that would be necessary would be to shut the floodgate, pump out the water, and have the constructors extend the dock 30 feet. Then it would accommodate any of the cruisers or any of the battleships of our Navy; but in spite of the recommendation of officers of the Navy, there is not a word in the naval bill looking toward that small addition to the only facilities of the kind on our coast south of Hatteras!

Mr. WHEELER. But we are going to build all these ships either in New England or at Newport News. Why should we go down and help build up the navy yard at Charleston?

Mr. SMITH. I am not pleading for Charleston alone, Mr. President.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield a moment, I am tired of the Senator from Montana always talking about the Chesapeake Bay. I wish to say that in the early days a survey was made by the English Crown of all its North American possessions, in an endeavor to find the best place for the location of a navy yard, and it was located at Norfolk, on the Chesapeake Bay, bordering on Hampton Roads. No report has ever been made by any board seeking to abolish this navy yard on Chesapeake Bay, which is the best body of water in the world. I am tired of people always minimizing the importance of that bay. The Senator does not know anything about what a good body of water is. He ought to do down there. We treat mountain people nicely when they go there, and if he will come down, we will show the Senator what a real body of water is.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia should take the Senator from Montana over there and show it to him.

Mr. SWANSON. I will some time. The Senator from Montana thinks Hamptons Roads are macadam roads. He does not know it is a body of water. He has been disturbed, thinking we were building ships on macadam roads. He does not know what Hampton Roads is.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Virginia, while all that is true, what is the matter with South Carolina?

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to say that when an effort has been made to abolish the navy yard at Charleston, I have made every effort to have it retained. I have joined in abolishing no navy yard like that at Charleston. The Senator will recall that several times efforts have been made to reduce the activities down there. I know full well that if we ever got into a war and Charleston Harbor had been closed, we would spend more in six months to bring it back than all it had cost up to that time.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then why does not the Senator join us, and we will start something to put South Carolina and Florida and that section of the country on the map?

Mr. SWANSON. When the time comes, the Senator from Iowa would vote against any increase for South Carolina, nine times out of ten, at least.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I do not like to have the Charleston Navy Yard, in South Carolina, made conspicuous as being the only possible place where there could be a navy yard. There are as many facilities for navy yards and naval construction south of Hatteras as there are north of Hatteras. Why have they not been put in those places? Does any man on this floor believe that the defense of this country, and the necessity for maintaining our commerce, could best be served by putting within 500 miles every navy yard and dry dock the Government constructed? Does he believe that that was the result of calm, considerate judgment in reference to the best development of the country and its best defense?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I think that if the Senator from South Carolina should ask any of the North Atlantic representatives, they would tell him that the North Atlantic States are the only part of the Union that is any good any way.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the action to which I have referred seems indefensible. We can not get rid of the fact that it smacks of criminal neglect of the public welfare for private purposes. We know that, and if I am to commit myself to a broad scheme of national defense, it must not be such as to indicate that I have been a party to a certain section's benefit, without an adequate return to the entire American people.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the Senator think that if we are going to have war with England, as several gentlemen have intimated, we made a very serious mistake when we did not fortify all the boundary line along North Dakota and Montana and Washington, and the rest of those Northern States, against Canada?

Mr. SMITH. I am predicating what I say upon the basis that the argument and the contention for these cruisers has been founded on the necessity for the protection in time of war of our merchant marine and our exports and imports on the seas, and also to provide an adequate defense in case of war or emergency. I am taking that broad ground. What are the facts? The facts are that we are still continuing to congest all of our activities in a little bight of the coast 500 miles long, leaving 4,000 miles absolutely defenseless, without any facility whatsoever for taking care of this huge sum of money we are going to put into these cruisers, sending them out on the high seas, the South Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, the Caribbean, the very gateway of all of our oriental commerce in those waters. We are to send them out, and in case of any accident allow them to limp around or be towed thousands of miles to very inconvenient places.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, they are also neglecting 3,000 miles of international boundary between Canada and the United States, are they not?

Mr. SMITH. We are talking about cruisers; we are talking about water defense; and I am not taking cognizance of the land forces. I am talking about the absurd position in which this Congress and the preceding Congresses have put themselves, when a party called a national party and standing for equal national defense congests in one little bight of the coast all those facilities.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in that respect the Republican Party has been about as generous to the North as to the South, because we have over a thousand miles of water front along the border of Canada, with not even a motor boat to protect it, and we have had it that way for considerably over a hundred years. We have more commerce going through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal than goes through either the Suez or the Panama Canal, and, as I recollect it, it is twice as much as goes through both of them, or something like that. So the Republican Party have not been very generous toward the North, too; they have spent no money there.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, when it comes to a question of millions of dollars, they become cannibalistic; they eat themselves, as they did when that was a sparsely settled territory.

I am simply calling attention to the absurd position in which we find ourselves, boasting of our desire to adequately defend our country, boasting of the fact, and I agree that we ought to do what is proper for our defense. It is our duty, as Senators and Representatives, to see that our country, with its vast wealth, its unlimited opportunities, shall not be offered as a temptation to any nation or nations of the earth, that step by step with our development should go, pari passu, our defense arrangements.

Mr. President, I shall vote for measures looking to proper defense. I believe that we have no right to leave unprotected the priceless treasures of this Nation, not only our resources, but our form of government. I shall vote to do it. But I will not vote to make a laughing stock of the manner in which we go out to do it, and to put all of our efforts in one little isolated community, and leave the great sweep of our coast without a single facility for adequate defense.

Mr. President, I am not feeling well, and had no business to-day attempting to call attention to these absurdities right at our doors. On Monday, if I have an opportunity, I want to call attention to the fact which all must recognize, that the great Mississippi River, starting with our inland seas, bisects our Continent, and pours into the Gulf of Mexico, the greatest waterway on earth. Yet nowhere around is any facility for the development of commerce, or for the protection of the commerce that would come down naturally and ultimately will come down the Mississippi and the Mississippi Valley to the South Atlantic and Gulf ports, because, as the population gets denser and we get more standardized, and the struggle for existence gets sharper, this absurd thing of carrying across country and over mountains and up and down grades the commerce of the valley will cease, and all of these people will take advantage of that great waterway, and this will be the great commercial export and import center of this country. It is the natural logic of physical conditions.

I will continue, if I have an opportunity, on Monday, with a vast amount of details which I want to bring out before I shall have closed what I have to say.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, the hour is very late, and I give notice that on Monday, at the convening of the Senate, I shall address myself to the pending cruiser bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, some Senators construe the unanimous-consent agreement, which was entered into with reference to the bill, to preclude the consideration after 4 o'clock of any amendment except the amendments then pending. I think it ought to be understood that the unanimous-consent agreement would permit the discussion under the 10-minute rule of any amendment that may be proposed before 4 o'clock. But in view of the difference of opinion, some Senators have asked that the unanimous-consent agreement may be modified so that amendments offered before 4 o'clock, even though they may not be technically pending, may be considered after 4 o'clock under the 10-minute limit. I understand under the rule that, in order to modify the unanimous agreement, I must give one day's notice, so I propose to give the notice and I shall ask that the matter come up on Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Washington that that rule applies only when there is a definite time set for a vote, but not where there is merely a limitation of debate.

Mr. JONES. Then I ask that the proposed modification of the unanimous-consent agreement may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed modification of the unanimous-consent agreement will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to modify the unanimous-consent agreement by providing that amendments introduced before 4 o'clock shall be treated as pending at and after 4 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed modification?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I do not understand the proposal. Is it the idea that amendments may be offered after 4 o'clock and that then there will be time allowed to consider and discuss them?

Mr. JONES. No; it is proposed that amendments may be offered before 4 o'clock and, even though they may not be actually pending, that they may be considered after 4 o'clock under the 10-minute rule. No amendment may be proposed after 4 o'clock.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask what is to be done in this situation. Suppose an amendment is proposed before 4 o'clock which, if successful, would necessitate the introduction of another amendment or, if defeated, would make it desirable to introduce another amendment. What would be done in that case. Would such an amendment be entirely excluded from consideration?

Mr. JONES. They would be excluded under the unanimous consent agreement already made.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would like to make a suggestion to the Senator. It will be a physical impossibility for more than one amendment to be pending at the same time. Everybody concedes that. An amendment pending at 4 o'clock, if every Senator took advantage of the 10-minute rule, might prohibit or prevent any other amendment from being offered. The Senator from Ohio has very well suggested that some amendment may be agreed to that would make necessary some other change in another amendment. I think we ought to modify the agreement by striking out the words "and no amendment shall be proposed after 4 o'clock p. m. on said day."

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I do not see how a unanimous-consent agreement can be altered at this hour by unanimous consent. A great many Senators who agreed to the unanimous consent agreement are not here now. It can be done Monday, but I would object until Monday when more Senators will be present.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to taking it up Monday, but it is perfectly apparent that we can not offer an amendment when one is pending. I suppose the Senator's change would make all amendments that have now been offered and that are printed possible of consideration under the rule. Is that the intention?

Mr. JONES. All that may be offered before 4 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. For instance, I offered an amendment the other day, but it is not a pending amendment.

Mr. JONES. No; but it would be under my proposal.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not want to be prevented from offering that amendment. We are liable to get into the very difficulty which the Senator from Ohio has suggested. It is not going to hurt anyone if we take that clause out. I suppose if that had been suggested the other day the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] would have willingly taken that language from his proposed agreement.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to hear what the proposal is. I was not in the Chamber when it was read.

Mr. JONES. I gave notice that on Monday I would propose to modify the unanimous-consent agreement. I had not looked at the rule and I had the impression that notice had to be given to modify the unanimous-consent agreement, but the Chair says that I am in error. My proposal was simply to provide that amendments which may be offered before 4 o'clock may be treated as pending.

Mr. HALE. I think that was the intention of the agreement.

Mr. JONES. I think so myself. Of course, the situation suggested by the Senator from Ohio is liable to arise, that we might have an amendment proposed before 4 o'clock which would have to be amended itself, but, under the unanimous-consent agreement, such an amendment to that amendment could not be proposed after 4 o'clock.

Mr. SWANSON. My recollection is that the unanimous-consent agreement provides that no amendments are to be proposed after a certain hour, when the debate is limited to 10 minutes. I think the Senator from Nebraska has usually insisted on that, and I think very properly so. For instance, a Senator might come here with a surprise amendment which no one had ever heard or thought of, and had no opportunity to discuss, and we might be forced to vote on it without any opportunity to consider it.

Mr. NORRIS. It could not be done under this unanimous-consent agreement because debate is allowed.

Mr. SWANSON. It does not give much time to discuss such an amendment fully. We had one case, I remember, where an amendment was brought in and everybody knew very little about it, and as a consequence of that incident we have usually put into such agreements such a provision as the Senator has now suggested. I do not remember definitely the occasion of which I speak. I think the Senator from Nebraska usually insisted on this provision more than anyone else, and I agreed with him.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator is partially mistaken. I have always insisted that instead of limiting debate absolutely we should cut down the length of the speeches and let the debate terminate itself.

Mr. SWANSON. I am not willing to have an amendment brought in here after 4 o'clock by surprise when nobody knows anything about it.

Mr. NORRIS. Nobody wants it to be done.

Mr. SWANSON. Then what is the suggestion?

Mr. NORRIS. My suggestion to the Senator from Washington was to meet the very logical objection of the Senator from Ohio by striking out the last clause in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SWANSON. Then we could debate any amendment we please, but we could not speak more than 10 minutes on it?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I have no objection to modifying it so that it is clearly the intention that any amendment to an amendment can be offered after 4 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. That would take care of it. That would obviate the difficulty to a great extent.

Mr. SWANSON. I suggest that we let it go over until Monday.

Mr. JONES. Very well; there is no hurry about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed modification of the unanimous-consent agreement will lie on the table until Monday.

DEFORESTED AMERICA (S. DOC. NO. 216)

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have a very valuable paper here entitled "Deforested America," by Maj. George P. Ahern. It contains very valuable information as to the problem of deforestation in this country, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16301) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES, Mr. OVERMAN, and Mr. GLASS conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE TARIFF

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives (H. Con. Res. 48), which was read:

Resolved, etc., That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 2,500 additional copies of the consolidated hearings held before the committee relative to "Tariff readjustment, 1929" during the current session.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Have the hearings been printed?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The concurrent resolution relates to the hearings up to date. It has just come over from the House, with an urgent request that it be passed immediately.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

WAR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the hour is very late, and I know that Senators do not want to stay here for a long consideration of the Army appropriation bill. It was my thought, however, that we might take it up and dispose of some of the amendments upon which there is no question whatever. If the Senate will permit us to spend 10 or 15 minutes in the consideration of the bill, I will agree to postpone consideration of any amendment about which there may be question, or to go back on Monday, when we take the bill up again, and have reconsidered any amendment which any Senator may then object to. I think with that understanding there can be no prejudice to anyone in acting on any amendment to-day.

I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15712, making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator would not ask for the passage of the bill this afternoon, even though we should finish the amendments?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no. I shall ask that we postpone consideration of amendments to which I know there is objection, and on Monday or Tuesday, or whenever we take the bill up again, I shall agree, at the request of any Senator, to ask for a reconsideration of any action taken to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15712) making appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill first be read for action on the committee amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I ask also that the secretary may be authorized to correct the totals at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will proceed to read the bill.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Contingencies of the Army," on page 7, line 5, after the word "proper," to strike out "and for examination of estimates of appropriations in the field, $12,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to read:

For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices in the District of Columbia, or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified, to be expended on the approval or authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, $10,000.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, that is a misprint, and therefore I move to amend the committee amendment to make it read "$133,615,538."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 12, line 16, amend the committee amendment by striking out "$136,615,568" and inserting in lieu thereof "$133,615,538."

Total, National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, $9,506,420.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, should not that amendment go over?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amendment seems to be very long, but it is simply to take care of the increase in pay of the employees at soldiers' homes as required by the Welch Act. It has the approval of the Budget Bureau and of the War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes all the committee amendments, except those which have been reserved for future consideration.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understand there is a desire to have a brief executive session.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business for a moment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is an amendment which I desire to propose, on page 34, line 21, with regard to the procurement of helium. I move to strike out the words "of which sum such amounts as may be required may be transferred in advance to the Bureau of Mines."

The object of the amendment is merely to enable the Army to purchase helium as cheaply as it may be offered, whether by the Bureau of Mines or by private parties, and not to force it to purchase it at the Bureau of Mines, as is the interpretation of the present language in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut, perhaps, was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Pennsylvania, in charge of the bill, stated that any amendment to which there should be objection would be passed over to be considered later.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand that there is no objection to this amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the amendment myself.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut has nothing whatever to do with the question of the maintenance of Scott Field, about which the Senators from Illinois are naturally interested. I myself see no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me ask the Senator if any of the amendments to the bill have relation to Selfridge Field by way of reducing the appropriation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is no amendment reported by the committee which reduces the allotment to Selfridge Field.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for the information.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 4, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, February 2, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou who art the Mighty One, Master of all forces and the Lord of men and angels, we most humbly acknowledge Thy claims and the right of Thy sovereignty as Lord of Lords and King of Kings. We praise Thee for a Father in Heaven who is a refuge for His children on earth. Thy merciful hand is always reaching out toward us, challenging every other one. May we clasp it. Thou wilt lift us out of weakness into strength, out of sin into goodness, and out of death into life. Oh, urgently persuade us that life is too precious and the world too fair for us to darken them with the clouds of selfishness and neglect. Thou who art so worthy to be worshipped, adored, and served come with us; make every morning a rose dawn and every evening a heavenly calm. In the holy name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 14151. An act to provide for the establishment of a Coast Guard station at or near the mouth of the Quillayute River, in the State of Washington.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 4818. An act for the relief of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex.

S. 5339. An act to enable the Rock Creek and Potomac Parkway Commission, established by act of March 4, 1913, to make slight changes in the boundaries of said parkway by excluding therefrom and selling certain small areas and including other limited areas, the net cost not to exceed the total sum already authorized for the entire project.

PENSIONS

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14800) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers, sailors, and marines of said war, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement on the part of the managers be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
PETER NORBECK,
PETER G. GERRY,

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House on H. R. 14800 state, by the way of explanation, that 2,935 House bills were included in said omnibus pension bill when it was reported to the House, December 5, 1928. The bill was called up in the House and passed December 14, 1928, and 21 amendments were offered striking out the names of proposed beneficiaries who had died since the bill was reported on December 5, 1928. The 2,914 House bills were considered by the Senate Committee on Pensions and favorably reported back to the Senate with amendments, the amendments being names of 52 proposed beneficiaries who had died since the passage of the bill in the House. They added to the House bill as an amendment 171 private Senate bills, and it was over the differences of opinion that existed in 5 of these bills that the House asked for a conference, and after carefully reviewing these cases the managers mutually agreed to restore 2 of the 5 cases, striking out 3 Senate bills and making a total of 168 private Senate bills amended to the House bill. The House lost no bills other than the ones they requested to be struck out because the proposed beneficiaries had died.

W. T. FITZGERALD,
RICHARD N. ELLIOTT,
ARTHUR H. GREENWOOD,
Managers on the part of the House.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ELLIOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

ADDRESS OF HON. FRANK GARDNER

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech of my colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GARDNER] on good citizenship and character building, delivered at the Eastern High School commencement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the following commencement address was delivered by my colleague, Hon. FRANK GARDNER, of Indiana, to the graduating class of Eastern High School on January 31, 1929:

CITIZENSHIP AND CHARACTER BUILDING

"America is God's crucible, the great melting pot, where all the races of Europe are melting and reforming."

As you know, this is a statement made by David in the book called "The Melting Pot."

At the time of the early history of this country many of the people of Europe were being sorely oppressed because of their religious views, and they were being heavily burdened and many hardships were being inflicted upon them by the ruling heads of Europe. Many of the best people of Europe came to this country because they were oppressed, because they were so burdened, because they were seeking liberty, and because they considered this a land of promise. And looking across the waters they saw this land of promise beckoning to them.

Again David, of the Melting Pot, says:

"When I look at our Statue of Liberty, I just seem to hear the voice of America crying, 'Come unto me ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest.'"

These people did come to this country—this land of promise—and they came not as Englishmen, not as Irishmen, not as Germans, but they came to this land of promise as Americans. They went through the melting pot and came out Americans. They established a new race of people—Americans. They established a new country—the greatest country God's sun ever shone upon—America.

Even after coming to this country they were still oppressed by the tyranny of a foreign ruler, which brought on a revolution that resulted in a free country for a liberty-loving people. As a result of that conflict our forefathers wrote a Declaration of Independence and a code of laws that we call our Constitution, which has been the basic law of our land even to this day. Good citizenship demands that we love and obey the provisions of that Constitution and the laws based thereon, and it is the duty of every American citizen to preach and teach love of country and obedience to law and order, and by so doing create a better citizenship. And there is always a need for a better citizenship.

The better we educate the younger generation the better that generation will be qualified for citizenship, and by educating the individual we are benefiting the community and the country, and thus we are raising the standard of citizenship. It is the good influence of the home, the church, and the school that produces a better citizenship. In the home lessons are learned that guide the individual through life. The church has a wonderful influence for good. But it is the influence the school has upon the child to which I desire to call your attention. Aside from the home and the church, there is nothing else that does so much for the upbuilding of the child—and through the child, the community—as does the influence of our public schools. Good teachers have a wonderful influence in molding the character of the child. Aside from the material benefit derived by the child from his studies in school, the school is molding the character of the child, and is fitting the child for his life work.

We are justly proud of our public-school system, and the pupils are fortunate who have the privilege of attending Eastern High School, under the management and instruction of its able principal, Professor Hart, and his corps of efficient teachers. They are doing a wonderful work, and are producing good results, and their efforts should be, and are, appreciated. I am sure that Mrs. Gardner and I appreciate the fact that our daughter Aldine has had the opportunity of attending Eastern High School, and has had the benefit of the instruction of these teachers, and has the privilege of being one of the graduates of the class of 1929.

In the study of physics, one of the laws we learn is that there is no force lost. That is, when a force is started it continues on forever. Shakespeare recognizes this fact when he says:

"We become a part of everything we meet."

I like to think that our lives are not lost, but that we live on and on forever. That is, the good we do through life has its influence that passes on through the coming generations. So it is with what this class has learned in this school. As these graduates go out into the world they impart knowledge, and the good they produce influences their associates. In that way the work done in this school by these teachers will go on and on doing good.

To the graduating class of 1929—I want to congratulate you on this your graduation. We call this a commencement. That means the beginning of your career. You have completed the requirements for graduation from this high school, and you have done well. I am sure that what you have learned will be helpful to you. What you have learned, of itself, will be helpful to you, but your greatest benefit will be that you have learned to think, and to reason. This is fast becoming an age when one must succeed by reason of his ability to think and reason rather than by his manual labor.

Those of you who have the opportunity to do so should strive for a higher education. As time goes on an education becomes more and more helpful to success in life. And it is the education, and the training you receive in youth, that develops you and forms your character, and makes you what you will be in your future life. In youth you are making your life for the future. The good deeds that you do now in youth are builders for your future life. We fashion our own character, and all experience teaches us that we become that which we make ourselves. Our every act leaves its impress upon our character. George Eliot says:

"Our deeds shall travel with us from afar
And what we have been makes us what we are."

That is very true. Our deeds and our acts in youth so mold and form our character that we can truly say with George Eliot:

"What we have been makes us what we are."

I am anxious to impress upon you that your life in youth makes you what you will be in the future. That it is this period of your life in which you are laying the foundation for a better future life. So bear in mind:

"Golden years are fleeting by;
Youth is passing, too.
Learn to make the most of life,
Lose no happy day.
Time will never bring thee back
Chances swept away.

Leave no tender word unsaid,
Love while life shall last,
The mill will never grind
With the water that is passed.

"All that thou canst call thine own,
Lies in thy to-day.
Power, intellect, and health
May not, can not last;
The mill will never grind
With the water that is passed."

Let me impress upon you that you bear in mind that this is still the land of opportunity. That you can not change the past. That it is necessary for you to improve the present. That the future is open before you. Remember—

"What hath been written shall remain,
Nor be erased nor written o'er again.
The future only remains for thee;
Take heed, and ponder well what that shall be."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. YON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by having inserted in the RECORD an article by Vincente G. Bunian on the Philippine situation, printed in The Nation of January 23, 1929.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object, Mr. Speaker.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 16792) to amend sections 599, 600, and 601, of subchapter 3 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia, that has been referred to the District of Columbia Committee, be rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I have taken this up with the chairman of the District Committee, and in view of the fact that the subject matter of this bill has already been considered by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee has no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hesitates somewhat to recognize the gentleman for this purpose, because he is absolutely clear that the reference to the District of Columbia Committee was proper. The bill seeks to amend the District Code in order to permit the incorporation of a certain society. The incorporation of similar societies has invariably been referred to the District of Columbia Committee.

The Chair would not recognize the gentleman if this was to be considered as setting a precedent in such cases, but if the gentleman has consulted with the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee, and it is mutually agreeable to the two committees, the Chair will recognize the gentleman for this purpose.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], the leader of the minority, is not in the Chamber at the moment, and gentlemen will recall that the other day, when a similar matter came up and it was proposed to make a change in the reference of a bill from one committee to another, where the bill was properly in that committee, the gentleman indicated he might object, and the Speaker asked the gentleman making the request to defer it, as I recall. This is a similar case, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. It is not precisely similar.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. As I understand it, this is a bill that is properly before the District of Columbia Committee, and by agreement between the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee they are going to make a rereference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary; is that correct?

Mr. STOBBS. No; there is no agreement between the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and the chairman of the District of Columbia Committee. The subject matter of this bill came before the Committee on the Judiciary in a different form and was properly before our committee.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What is the gentleman's committee—the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. STOBBS. The Judiciary Committee. It was heard by a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee and is now pending before the full committee, and it has been decided that if this legislation is to be put into effect it ought to be put into effect by amending the District Code.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will not the gentleman defer his request until the gentleman from Tennessee, the minority leader, can be here, because the gentleman from Tennessee has discussed this matter and I wish the gentleman would withhold it until that time.

Mr. STOBBS. I will be very glad to do that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, does this involve the issue of a charter to a corporation?

Mr. STOBBS. That is just the trouble; the Judiciary Committee did not want to act upon it because there could be an incorporation under the law of the District.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the situation to be this: The gentleman from Massachusetts introduced a private bill which he had the right to refer to any committee he chose to, and it was referred by the gentleman to the Committee on the Judiciary. Subsequently he introduced this bill as a general law amending the District of Columbia Code, covering all such cases. That being a public bill, the Chair referred it to the District of Columbia Committee. The Chair thought that under such circumstances no other reference could be possible, inasmuch as it would only affect the incorporation of societies in the District of Columbia.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16714, the naval appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recalls that the request for the division of the time only applied to yesterday.

Mr. FRENCH. Pending my motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided, to be controlled one-half by the gentleman from Kansas and one-half by myself, and so apportioned that whatever loss one may have sustained yesterday may be regained to-day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that general debate be divided between himself and the gentleman from Kansas, and that such time as either one consumed in excess of the other be counted in the distribution to-day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. FRENCH was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16714) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hesitate to take the time of the House on a question which is not actually before it at this time. In view, however, of the fact that the cruiser bill is now before the Senate, of the probability of its return to the House by reason of amendment, and of the recent remarks in the House by my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, I desire to record my opposition as well as that of the district which I have the honor to represent to the so-called Dallinger amendment, requiring the construction in navy yards and other plants of the Government of 8 of the 15 cruisers provided for under the bill, including 3 of the 5 which are to be first constructed.

I regret to find myself in disagreement with my colleague, but can not escape the conviction that the amendment is fundamentally wrong in principle and contrary to the best interests of the country as a whole in so far as it attempts to substitute a decision at this time by legislation for the exercise of the sound discretion by the Secretary of the Navy when the question of awarding contracts for construction actually arises. It is impossible, in my opinion, to give appropriate consideration prior to that time to such matters as comparative costs, efficiency, facilities, and needs in competing yards, and only in the light of such consideration, in my judgment, can it be fairly determined to what extent it is advisable for the Government to enter the business of shipbuilding.

It will be recalled that the amendment was adopted in the House by a vote of 115 to 102. It was not my privilege to be present at the time, but it appears that the amendment was adopted in the light of figures submitted tending to indicate that a substantial saving might be expected in respect to all cruisers constructed in Government yards as compared with those constructed in private yards. Subsequently at hearings before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs it became apparent that these figures had been misinterpreted and that in at least one instance exactly the opposite conclusion was warranted.

The amendment is opposed by the Navy Department. It is opposed by the Shipping Board. At the time of adoption by the House it was opposed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Madden, stated that in his opinion all ships built in a Government yard would cost $1,000,000 more than if built elsewhere. This opinion appears to be confirmed by actual experience in respect to the cruiser which is just about to be completed in the New York Navy Yard. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, Mr. Butler, mentioned a higher figure. The National Council of American Shipbuilders estimates the increased cost at a minimum of $2,318,000, with nothing included for plant depreciation, repairs and upkeep, insurance other than employees' liability insurance, or general expenses.

I do not purport to have any expert knowledge of comparative costs. It is presumably impossible to make any accurate comparison in advance of the receipt of competitive bids. The mere possibility, however, of any such saving as is suggested by those referred to, seems to me the strongest kind of argument for allowing the Secretary of the Navy to exercise discretion in the matter as and when the occasion arises. I do not believe it is sound to adopt a program in the absence of essential figures which, when available, may indicate that we are imposing an unnecessary burden of millions of dollars on the people of this country.

It should be noted in this connection that while the amendment requires the construction in Government yards of three of the five cruisers first to be constructed, there are only two of these yards, those at New York and Puget Sound, which are in a position at this time to do any of the required construction work. I am advised that facilities at Mare Island will not be available for about two years and that those at Boston, Philadelphia, and Norfolk can only be made available by the expenditure of further and substantial sums.

The needs of the Government yards have been advanced in justification of the amendment. It has been stated that there are hundreds of millions of dollars invested in the Government yards and that they have been operated at from 10 to 50 per cent of their respective capacities. This is no doubt true but it is also true that there are hundreds of millions invested in the private yards and that they have been in a deplorable condition.

If I am correctly informed, there were 23 private yards in 1916, not counting those of a temporary nature created for war purposes only. To-day there are 11, the latest casualty occurring, I believe, in Los Angeles in December. Unless those private yards which are capable of large naval construction are sustained by naval contracts, there is grave danger that the number will become still smaller. Largely as a result of the reduction of armament conference and the admission of foreign-built ships to American registry, there has been a continuous decline in shipbuilding in this country ever since 1921. I understand that in each of the years 1922 to 1927, inclusive, the total merchant shipbuilding was less, with one possible exception, than that in any pre-war year since 1897. The vessels contracted for by each of the principal yards are said to have averaged less than two and one-half per year, representing, exclusive of five cruisers, employment for about 1,250 persons per yard, or say one-quarter of the number considered necessary for profitable operation. Technical staff requiring years of training and one of the most vital elements in the design and construction of naval vessels has dwindled to about 25 per cent of that available in 1916. I am advised that no private yard engaged in new construction is operating in excess of one-third of its capacity.

A description of the condition of the industry as a whole appears in some detail in a statement with which Members of the House may be familiar—a statement made by Mr. H. G. Smith, vice president of the National Council of American Shipbuilders, before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, on February 29, 1928. The needs of the Government yards may appear to be great, but we must not lose sight of those of the private yards. In the last analysis, the Government yards would continue to exist in the absence of any construction work. To the private yards such work is lifeblood. The construction of a cruiser provides employment for substantially the same number of persons wherever it takes place, and if needs are to be a determining factor, then, in my opinion, the needs of all competing yards, both Government and private, should be given the most careful consideration at the time of the award of contracts.

The immediate question, as I see it, is not a question between Government yards and private yards. It is rather a question of permitting the preservation and appropriate development of both with due regard to the financial burden imposed upon the country as a whole. Both in their proper spheres are indispensable. The essential part played for the Navy by the Government yards is perfectly apparent. The part played by private yards is of real concern, not only to the Navy but also to the merchant marine.

Prior to 1914 from 75 to 80 per cent of our naval vessels were built in private yards. When the crisis came in the World War these yards not only executed enormous programs for destroyers and submarines, in addition to building a great number of vessels for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, but also took care of the repair and reconditioning of naval vessels for which there were inadequate facilities in Government yards, to the extent of some $75,000,000. The Secretary of the Navy recognizes clearly that both types of yard are vital to our system of national defense. In appearing before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, he stated that if we are to maintain our present Navy, replace the units in it as they become obsolete, and add to it the reasonable number of auxiliaries contemplated by the present bill, we shall need the facilities of all the Government yards and of all the private yards that are now equipped to do this sort of work and doing it. The Secretary of the Navy, in my judgment, is in the best possible position to determine upon the award of contracts when the question actually arises in the light of the needs and facilities of all the yards and of the interests of the taxpayers generally. I believe that he should be allowed to exercise his best judgment in the matter to this end.

The Dallinger amendment deprives the Secretary of the Navy of all discretion in respect to a specified number of cruisers. To this extent it eliminates a fundamental element of competition and requires construction in Government yards regardless of economy, efficiency, available facilities, comparative needs, or any other considerations. It obligates the Government to enter the business of shipbuilding to an extent which may well prove to be uneconomic and inadvisable. I believe it to be unsound and I believe its unsound character will become increasingly apparent. I sincerely hope that a way may be found in the Senate, in conference or otherwise, either to eliminate the amendment completely or to so modify it as to restore to the Secretary of the Navy a discretion in the matter comparable to that which he has heretofore exercised.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DENISON. I was going to ask the gentleman if he could inform the House why it is we can not build these ships in the Government yards more economically from the Government standpoint than in private shipyards. In private shipyards we know the contractor must figure on a substantial profit, and, as I understand, the Government does not pay any higher wages to employees than those paid for similar work in private yards. If these facts are true, why is it the Government can not save money by having these ships built in its own shipyards where profit does not enter into consideration?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. If, in fact, we can build more economically in Government yards, that fact should be established and should be taken into consideration at the time of the award of contracts. Those who contend that it is more economical to build in private yards maintain, as I understand it, that the labor cost in a Government yard largely exceeds that in a private yard. In a statement which I shall include in my remarks there is a computation made which shows a very marked difference in this respect.

Mr. DENISON. Of course, the Government has on hand in the various navy yards a large force of men. Now, the expense of maintaining these men will continue whether they are at work or not. That element must be taken into consideration in determining the question as to where these ships are to be built. The men employed in the Government yards are on the Government pay roll and I take it there would be a considerable overhead expense continuing with Government yards whether they are at work or not, and from the standpoint of economy that fact ought to be taken into consideration.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Gladly.

Mr. DALLINGER. Is it not a fact that the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the other body admitted the other day that the net cost to the Government in Government yards in building cruisers was not greater than that in private yards?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I do not remember the exact words which he used. I think he stated in effect that it was not clear that this was a fact from such investigation as his committee had made. This seems to me to be an added reason for deferring decision in the matter until we have further and essential facts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. DALLINGER. Does the gentleman think the policy of the other great powers and the policy of this country in the greater part of its history in having its war vessels built in its own yards was wrong, or does he think that they should have been built in private yards?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think that a decision as to the place of construction can best be made when all possible evidence is at hand in the light of the considerations to which I have referred. I think the Secretary of the Navy is in the best possible position to make the decision. Obviously I do not wish to be understood as advocating that all the cruisers be constructed either in the Government yards or in the private yards. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Under leave granted I insert the following:

STATEMENT BY THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF AMERICAN SHIPBUILDERS CONCERNING THE CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS IN GOVERNMENT NAVY YARDS

The National Council of American Shipbuilders is composed of the principal companies in the United States engaged in building and repairing vessels and in manufacturing marine equipment. Its membership comprises 90 per cent of the companies engaged in these industries.

A bill now pending in Congress, H. R. 11526, if enacted will authorize the construction of 15 light cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier, the construction of 5 cruisers to be undertaken during each of the fiscal years ending June 30, 1929, 1930, and 1931, and of the aircraft carrier prior to June 30, 1930.

The bill contains the following provisions, viz:

"And provided further, That the first and each succeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken, together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such 8 cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States."

The bill as introduced in the House of Representatives did not contain this restrictive provision, which is an amendment proposed in the House by Hon. FREDERICK W. DALLINGER, and is known as the Dallinger amendment.

The members of the National Council of American Shipbuilders are opposed to this amendment and, in opposition thereto, submit the following statement:

By this amendment, 8 of the 15 cruisers are required to be built in Government navy yards or other Government plants, 3 during the first year, 2 during the second year, and 3 during the third year.

The House passed the bill and the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs reported it to the Senate with the following amendment to the Dallinger amendment:

"except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government."

The bill is now pending before the Senate, and, if passed as reported by the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, it would still require 8 of the 15 cruisers to be built in Government navy yards although their machinery, ordnance, or other parts may be ordered of private manufacturers, if an appreciable saving in cost may be effected thereby.

The Senate Committee on Naval Affairs held a hearing on the Dallinger amendment, when the Secretary of the Navy opposed the amendment on the ground that it limited competition 'not only in the securing of the contracts, but in the performance of the work after it has been allotted to the yards.'

The principal argument in support of the Dallinger amendment is an alleged lower cost of the construction of vessels in Government navy yards than in private shipyards. This argument was supported by statements made on the floor of the House, which are to the same effect as the statements contained in a letter submitted to the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs by Mr. N. P. Alifas, president of District 44, International Association of Machinists, and printed in full in the Senate committee's hearings. The following are quotations from his letter:

"For instance, when the construction of the cruisers Pensacola and Salt Lake City, authorized by the act of December 18, 1924, was contemplated in March, 1925, the New York Navy Yard's estimate, including the main engine, was $7,799,499, and the bid of the Cramp Shipbuilding Co., upon similar specifications, was $8,673,833, a difference of $874,384 in favor of the navy yard. Although the New York yard was equipped to build both vessels, it was awarded only the construction of one, minus the main engines; and the Cramp Shipbuilding Co., which has since gone out of business, was awarded one cruiser and both sets of engines, together with certain auxiliaries, by adding $2,296,209 to their original bid. Considering economies possible if the New York yard had built both vessels and both sets of engines, doubtless $2,000,000 could have been saved our Government.

"On April 5, 1927, bids were opened by the Navy Department for the construction of the six remaining cruisers authorized by the act of December 18, 1924. The Mare Island Navy Yard's carefully revised estimate for two cruisers, including main engines, was $7,539,815 each.

"The Puget Sound Navy Yard's estimate for two cruisers, including main engines, was $8,045,000 each. The New York, Boston, Philadelphia, and Norfolk Navy Yards, although equipped to do this work, did not estimate. However, the New York yard estimate on the Pensacola indicates that the estimates of these yards would be about the same as the Pacific coast yards, and that they follow the same practices in estimating.

"The Mare Island and Puget Sound Navy Yards were awarded only one vessel each. The American Brown Boveri Corporation was awarded one vessel at $10,815,000. The Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation was awarded one vessel at $10,675,000, and the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. was awarded two vessels at $10,567,000 each. The navy-yard estimate and the private shipyard bids were upon the same specifications and therefore all of these figures are comparable.

"Comparing the average estimates of the two Pacific coast navy yards with the average bid of the three eastern private shipyards, the difference is $2,863,592.50 per vessel; or a total loss to the Government of $11,454,370 due to having four of these vessels constructed at private shipyards instead of at navy yards."

The statements contained in this letter are based on a misinterpretation of the figures then at the disposal of Mr. Alifas. He compares an estimated cost of building a cruiser in the New York Navy Yard, including its main engines, with the bid by the Cramp Shipbuilding Co. on a duplicate cruiser. In his comparison of costs Mr. Alifas uses $7,799,449, the estimate of the New York Navy Yard, and includes therein the main engine, and the bid of the Cramp Shipbuilding Co. The fact is that the estimate of the New York Navy Yard did not include the engines. Admiral Beuret confirms this error of comparison in his letter to Hon. FREDERICK HALE, chairman of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, under date of April 30, 1928, which letter is printed in the hearings before the Senate committee. The correct estimate of the New York Navy Yard, as given by Admiral Beuret, is $9,788,462. The bid of the Cramp Shipbuilding Co. is $8,673,833, so that instead of a saving of money to the Government by building a cruiser in the New York Navy Yard, as claimed by Mr. Alifas, such a cruiser will cost much more than one built in a private shipyard.

Admiral Beuret in his letter also corrects Mr. Alifas's figures with reference to the estimate of cost of each of the two cruisers now being built at the Mare Island and the Puget Sound Navy Yards, respectively, by showing that to each estimate of these yards must be added the sum of $219,250, the cost of plans not included in the estimate.

Mr. Alifas claims that the Government lost $11,454,370 due to having four cruisers constructed in private shipyards instead of in navy yards. It is shown above that his conclusions are based on a misinterpretation of information available. The Secretary of the Navy, in his remarks before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, states:

"On a study of the figures presented by the private yards and those of the navy yards on the west coast, we felt justified in awarding contracts to the west coast navy yards, although in grave doubt from their previous work and experience as to whether they could build for the figures presented or as low as the bids from private yards.

"We have tried to encourage the employees in the west coast naval yards to fulfill their tacit agreement to keep within their estimate. Admiral Robinson of the Bremerton yard feels sure that they can do it in that yard, and Admiral Dayton at Mare Island hopes that they also can build within their estimates.

"While we do not believe that they can or will, we felt justified in assigning them a cruiser each, in the hope that they would build for less than the private yards, and with reasonable certainty that they would not exceed the private bids."

The National Council of American Shipbuilders is of the opinion that the cost of building the cruiser in the Mare Island Navy Yard and the other in the Puget Sound Navy Yard will greatly exceed the contract prices of the private shipbuilders for similar cruisers now in the process of construction in their shipyards. This opinion is confirmed by the following quotation from a letter of the Bureaus of Construction and Engineering to the Secretary of the Navy, relative to these cruisers, under date of March 12, 1927:

"The cost of the work in a navy yard will necessarily be higher than that in a private shipyard for the following reasons:

"(1) The organization in a navy yard is not a shipbuilding organization based on and guided by shipbuilding experience. On the contrary, the organization is controlled largely by those without actual shipbuilding experience.

"(2) The civil service restrictions which make it impossible for the manager to 'hire and fire' necessarily impose on the manager restrictions which increase the cost of production.

"(3) The wages paid Government employees in a navy yard are appreciably higher than those paid for corresponding requirements in a private shipyard.

"(4) The Government pays full wages, without work, for 44 days a year made up of 30 days' annual leave, 7 national holidays, and 14 Saturday half holidays. The private contractor pays only for work done.

"(5) The navy yard may or may not be authorized to institute piecework. To a limited extent it is authorized in some navy yards but not authorized in others. Even so, however, the navy yard is so hampered in its management of piecework, not only by the law which prohibits time studies of operations, but also by the control exercised by the department on the management of the piecework in the yard, that the benefits are very much less than in a private yard. Also, up to the present time the navy yards have not been able to secure necessary departmental approval for handling 'contract' work on new construction. This particular item, i. e. piece and contract work, affects materially the cost of building a ship.

"(6) The lack of continuity in the progress of the work due to drawing off the men from time to time as required by the repair work in the yard.

"(7) The inability to secure competent draftsmen to properly and expeditiously handle the plans. The reasons for this are twofold—first, the limit placed by Congress on funds from which draftsmen can be paid; and, second, the shipyards themselves constitute the only source from which competent draftsmen can be secured."

(NOTE.—This letter is printed in full on pages 68–70 in the hearings before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs on April 27 and 28, 1928.)

The National Council of American Shipbuilders contends that the Dallinger amendment was passed by the House of Representatives on incorrect and misleading information and is in opposition thereto, both as it passed the House and as amended by the Senate Naval Committee, because:

1. The higher cost of construction of cruisers when built in Government navy yards than in private shipyards.

2. Private shipyards and the Government navy yards are assets of equal national importance; and their respective needs and the importance of maintaining personnel organizations should be considered when contracts are awarded for the construction of naval vessels. The Secretary of the Navy is in the position to know these respective needs and the award of contracts to private shipyards or to Government navy yards should, therefore, be left to his discretion, which the Dallinger amendment denies.

HIGHER COSTS OF NAVY-YARD CONSTRUCTION

There is no mystery about costs. The elements of costs are substantially the same in a navy yard and in a private shipyard. The actual cost to the Government of a new cruiser to be built in a private shipyard is the amount of the accepted bid of the private shipbuilder, which is definitely known when the contract is placed. The actual cost to the Government of a cruiser to be built in a navy yard can only be determined after the cruiser is built—which is some three years after the date of the contract. The impossibility of comparing navy-yard and private-shipyard costs at the time of placing contracts is therefore obvious.

Congress should be informed of the relative costs of vessels built in private shipyards and in Government navy yards. If a vessel built in a private shipyard costs more than a similar vessel built in a navy yard, the fact should be disclosed. If the contrary is true, that fact should be shown. The facts are ascertainable, and to this end the Navy Department has cooperated with the national council in an investigation to ascertain the factors entering into the cost of building both in a navy yard and in a private shipyard, and an analysis of such cost has been made.

This analysis shows the inevitable fact that a navy-yard built vessel will cost more than a private-shipyard built vessel.

Statistical naval accounting is done under two heads:

(a) Cost accounting under administrative classifications (titles and accounts) and units of output; i. e., by purposes and objects.

(b) Appropriation accounting under legislative authorization; i. e., by sources.

A navy yard has two main divisions, one of which is military and the other industrial. The latter is the division that has to do with the construction and repair of vessels.

An accurate distribution of cost by "purposes and objects" is the only distribution that gives the correct cost of building a vessel in a navy yard. In recent years the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts of the United States Navy Department has allocated to the cost of production of the industrial division of each navy yard items of expenditure which would be charged against the vessel if built in a private shipyard.

The National Council of American Shipbuilders is informed that the cost of construction of naval vessels built prior to 1920, as listed in the annual reports of the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, contain overhead charges (plant operating expense) of not over 30 per cent of the direct labor charged to such vessels. Experience in shipbuilding has demonstrated that this percentage is entirely too low. The Pensacola, a cruiser, now being built at the New York Navy Yard, will be the first vessel built in a navy yard to which the Navy Department will allocate its entire building costs.

The navy yard estimate for the cost of construction of a new vessel, in competition with the bid of a private shipyard, does not include all items of cost. For instance, the estimate does not include the cost of working plans, which for a single cruiser may amount to $500,000 in addition to the overhead expense thereon. The estimate does not include any repairs on machinery or equipment occasioned by their use. It is therefore evidence that such an estimate can not be considered as the basis of a fair comparison of the probable cost of the vessel with the price specified in the firm bid of a private shipbuilder.

In April, 1927, the Navy Department contracted with three private shipbuilders for the construction of four cruisers. The average contract price for each cruiser is $10,656,000. The average estimated direct material cost included in this price is $4,268,000, and the direct labor estimate $3,675,000.

An analysis made by the national council shows a probable cost of $12,974,000 for each of the cruisers, if built in a Government navy yard, as follows:

MATERIAL COST

The probable cost of material for a cruiser to be built in a navy yard will be about the same as the cost for a similar cruiser, if built in a private shipyard. The estimated material cost is therefore $4,268,000.

DIRECT LABOR COST

The direct labor cost of the construction of a cruiser in a Government navy yard will be greater than the labor cost of construction of a similar cruiser in a private shipyard.

The navy yards situated at Boston, Philadelphia, and Norfolk are classified as industrial navy yards. In the immediate vicinity of each is one of the three remaining large private shipyards capable of building naval vessels. They are the Fore River plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation (Ltd.), at Quincy, Mass.; New York Shipbuilding Co., Camden, N. J.; and Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co., Newport News, Va. The following wage comparisons are based upon average wages prevailing in the three navy yards, and similar averages prevailing in the three private shipyards. The number of employees at each wage has been taken for both the navy yards and private shipyards from actual figures furnished in each case.

An analysis of the wage sheets of the three navy yards and of the three private shipyards discloses a force of 7,105 currently employed by the three navy yards at an average hourly wage of $0.723 per hour; and a force of 7,077 men by the three private shipyards, who, if on an hourly wage basis, would earn an average hourly wage of $0.564 per hour, a difference of 28 per cent, due to two reasons:

(a) The wage is higher in navy yards than in private shipyards.

(b) A larger percentage of employees in navy yards are placed in the highest class and are paid the highest wage of their respective trades, a condition that does not prevail in the private shipyards.

The three navy yards rate from 74 per cent to 90 per cent of their employees in the highest class of each trade, or an average for the three navy yards of 82 per cent of the total working force in the highest class. On the other hand, the three private shipyards employ not over 35 to 50 per cent of their employees in the highest class of each trade.

It has been stated that employees of private shipyards are paid wages as high or higher than employees of navy yards are paid. It is evident that this is not a fact from the analysis based on hourly wages alone. Employees engaged on incentive work in private shipyards, however, do earn more than day workers. Navy yards have adopted systems of incentive work only to a limited extent, while private shipyards have adopted such systems whenever practicable, and employ on an average approximately 40 per cent of their labor force under some form of incentive system. The private shipbuilders believe in such systems and have practiced them for years and are fully convinced of their economic advantages. The 40 per cent of incentive workers thus employed by the three private shipyards earn wages higher than the figure of $0.564 per hour mentioned above as the hourly wage of day workers. Earnings of incentive workers in the three private shipyards average approximately 25 per cent more than the earnings of their day workers. Thus the average earnings of workmen under incentive systems are $0.705 per hour. The economic advantage of work under an incentive system is due to the fact that while workmen under such a system earn 25 per cent more than day workers, they produce, at the same time, 50 per cent more, so that for each $1 paid to a workman under an incentive system his actual production is greater than for each $1 paid to a day worker. Therefore by paying higher earnings to a workman under an incentive system the cost of production is decreased and not increased. If 60 per cent of a labor force is employed as day workers at an hourly wage of $0.564 and 40 per cent is employed under an incentive system at hourly earnings of $0.705, the average earning of the entire force will be:

.705	× 40 =	28,200
	100 =	62,040

Average rate, $0.6204 per hour.

The number of direct-labor hours required to build a cruiser in a private shipyard, therefore, may be determined by dividing $3,675,000, the estimated labor cost, by $0.6204, the average earning, or a total of 5,923,600 hours. Had the private shipyards dispensed with incentive work and employed day workers only, the time required to build the cruiser would have been 7,108,320 hours. Assuming an equal output per man per hour at each of the three navy yards and of the three private shipyards, it follows that it would require 7,108,320 working hours to build the cruiser in a navy yard employing day workers only. At $0.723 per hour the navy yard hourly wage gives a labor cost of $5,139,315 to build a cruiser in a navy yard as compared with a labor cost of $3,675,000 to build one in a private shipyard.

OVERHEAD EXPENSE

The figures for productive labor, shop expense, expense chargeable on Navy accounting system and idle-plant expense, as reported by the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, for six of the leading industrial navy yards for the fiscal year 1927, are as follows:

Yard	Productive labor	Total shop expense	Expense chargeable on Navy accounting system	Idle plant expense
Boston	$3,300,164.52	$2,667,254.55	$2,065,172.06	$602,082.49
New York	2,765,687.75	3,489,667.99	2,455,985.84	1,033,682.15
Philadelphia	3,191,818.82	4,474,119.96	2,455,224.39	2,018,895.57
Norfolk	3,263,082.21	3,675,276.63	2,361,889.56	1,313,387.07
Mare Island	2,781,961.16	3,252,421.43	2,228,254.24	1,024,167.19
Puget Sound	2,441,157.47	2,916,702.06	2,096,257.33	820,444.73
	17,743,871.93	20,475,442.62	13,662,783.42	6,812,659.20
Per cent		115	77	38

Overhead expense in shipbuilding is generally expressed as a percentage of the cost of such expense to the cost of direct labor. In the above table, figures 115, 77, and 38 are the percentages which the total cost in each of these columns bears to the total productive labor cost in column 1. The figure 77 in column 3, for instance, is obtained by dividing $13,662,783.42, in column 3, by $17,743,871.93, in column 1. The figures in column 2 are in each instance the sum of the corresponding figures of columns 3 and 4. Under the accounting system of the Navy Department, "Idle-plant expense," in column 4, is not charged against the cost of production. Column 3, "Expense chargeable on Navy accounting system," covers, firstly, variable items of expense occasioned by work under way and properly distributed to all industrial work, and, secondly, fixed expense, a part of which occurs whether there is industrial work in progress or not.

The amount of $13,662,783.42, expense chargeable to production on Navy accounting stytem in column 3, or 77 per cent of productive labor, includes $1,346,520.84 of such industrial fixed overhead.

Although a part of this industrial fixed overhead is undoubtedly occasioned by the productive work under way, the National Council of American Shipbuilders has given consideration to the claim that fixed expense should be ignored in determining navy-yard cost of new construction, although opposed to this claim in principle it has, however, eliminated such expense in the figures that follow:

Eliminating the fixed expense, or $1,346,520.84, from the expense as charged under Navy accounting system, in column 3, we have a total variable expense of $12,316,262.58, or 69.4 per cent, of the cost of productive labor.

As shown above, the estimated productive labor cost for one of the four cruisers, if built in an east-coast navy yard, would be $5,139,315. The overhead expense is therefore 69.4 per cent of this figure, or $3,566,685.

We have now obtained the estimated material, labor, and overhead expense costs for a cruiser if built in a Government navy yard, and therefore the total minimum cost will be as follows:

Direct material	$4,268,000
Direct labor, 7,108,320 hours, at $0.723 per hour	5,139,315
Overhead expense, 69.4 per cent of direct labor	3,566,685
Total cost to the Government	12,974,000

As previously stated, the average contract price for each of the four cruisers now in course of construction by private shipbuilders is $10,656,000 each. The minimum estimated navy-yard cost is therefore $2,318,000 greater for each cruiser than the average cost to be paid by the Government under the contracts for the construction of the four cruisers by private builders.

While the above figure of $12,974,000 is the estimated minimum navy-yard cost, it does not include any charge for plant depreciation, which the private builders estimate to be approximately $800,000 per cruiser. Further, the above navy-yard cost does not include charge for insurance, except for employees' liability insurance, nor for administrative and general expenses, nor for fixed expenses, such as repair and upkeep of plant and equipment, all of which are proper charges against production. All such items of cost must be borne by the private shipbuilders, whereas they are absorbed by the navy yards in "military" expense and are not included in the cost of production. The Government pays no taxes, while the private shipbuilding company pays approximately $110,000 per cruiser for State, county, and municipal taxes, which it can pay if it has work sufficient to enable it to remain in business and make a profit.

PRIVATE SHIPYARDS AS A FACTOR OF NATIONAL SECURITY

The national council asserts that the private shipyard and the Government navy yard are factors of equal importance to our national security.

The prime industrial function of a navy yard is to repair and maintain naval vessels. During a period of war the demands on the navy yards are so great as to require all of their facilities for these purposes. The construction of naval vessels in progress in navy yards at the commencement of a war is interrupted and can only be completed after the termination of a war. The experience of the navy yards during the World War confirms the truth of this statement. Therefore any new naval vessels required should be built in private shipyards, which national service they can not perform in times of an emergency unless they are able to maintain their organizations for this purpose in times of peace.

While navy yards are building naval vessels in time of peace they are performing work that they can not do in time of war, and are depriving the private shipyards of the work, which enables them to maintain their organizations and to be prepared to serve the Navy in time of war.

In the hearings before the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs on April 27 and 28, 1928, Admiral Capps emphasized the importance of the private shipbuilding industry to the Nation and the necessity of preserving it in time of peace to perform a national service in time of war, as follows:

"* * * I feel compelled to recall the grave experiences of the recent war due to congestion of work in public and private shipyards. At that time the navy yards had not only all repair work of the fleet to take care of, but, through contract provisions, the Navy Department had the right to use 70 per cent of the possible capacity of all the important private yards, so that the Emergency Fleet Corporation, in addition to the work it had to do in providing such a vast increase in shipping, had to do it in newly created yards, with newly trained personnel—and the conditions were serious to the last degree. In my judgment—and I speak from the experience I have had before, during, and since the Great War—the gradual reduction of our outside shipbuilding resources merits grave consideration, since we are now in a state far less satisfactory in the way of being able to build merchant vessels, men-of-war, and all the things needed for merchant marine development than we were in 1916 or 1917; and if this goes on, we may lack the necessary shipbuilding resources to maintain the fleet and effect replacements when the 'limitation of armament treaty' expires.

"The preservation, without undue sacrifice of private manufacturing resources, of all kinds requisite for the national defense is quite vital to the Government, and especially so in the case of our rapidly diminishing shipbuilding industry, and that is why I feel very strongly that claims of possible economy, one way or the other, should not have too much weight. Thorough competition should be encouraged; and that is what is provided for if the Secretary is given discretionary authority in inviting bids, and inquiring into the detailed estimates submitted with the bids. The competitive idea, in my judgment, is vital all along the line, either in Government yards or private yards."

The importance of the private shipyards is fully confirmed by experience during the World War, when substantially all of the facilities of the navy yards on the Atlantic coast were employed in repairing, reconditioning, and outfitting existing naval vessels. These navy yards were unable to comply with the demands made upon them for work of this character and were therefore obliged to employ the private shipyards to build naval vessels, and also to repair and recondition those in service. This is evidenced by the fact that the Navy Department paid approximately $75,000,000 to the private shipyards for such work. The Bureaus of Construction and Engineering, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, previously referred to in this statement, confirms the essential character of the private shipyards as a national asset in the following statement:

"An added reason for private construction—and one entirely apart from the economy of the situation as outlined above—is to be found in the fact that the shipyards (those that have built the major portion of our fleet) are a vital necessity for national defense. It is well known that with the practical cessation of merchant-fleet construction during recent years, some, if not all, of these yards are in a very precarious condition financially. Unless work is given them in the near future, it is doubtful if several of these we have most relied on for many years past for our best war products will survive as shipbuilding yards. In these circumstances the placing of orders for these cruisers in private yards is considered of great importance, particularly if the cost of the work therein is materially less than in navy yards.

"Summing up the above, it is believed that consideration of economy, of early construction, and of conserving national assets for turning out war products point clearly to the fact that the Government's interest can best be served by placing these vessels in private yards, provided reasonable bids are received, as there is every reason to expect."

The private shipbuilding industry is in a deplorable condition, and if this condition continues the industry will cease to perform the important national functions that it has performed in the past. Since the World War the private shipyards have had only five contracts for naval construction. During the year 1928 the United States is building only 2 per cent of the merchant vessel tonnage of the world now under construction, which is less than the tonnage under construction by any other important maritime nation as reported in Lloyd's quarterly reports.

Since 1921 a continuous decline of shipbuilding in the United States has been in progress. Unfinished war contracts for both the Navy and the Emergency Fleet Corporation and considerable new contracts acquired in 1919 and 1920 maintained fair activity in the private shipyards until the end of 1921, although the amount of new shipbuilding tonnage contracted for in 1921 was very small. From 1922 to 1927, inclusive, the total merchant shipbuilding each year, as shown by Lloyd's report, was, with one possible exception, less than during any pre-war year since 1897. The building of vessels in progress during this period in the United States presents a deplorable condition when compared with the ship construction in progress in foreign countries. The comparative amount of tonnage of merchant shipbuilding built in the United States and in certain foreign countries from 1922 to 1927 is as follows:

	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926	1927
Great Britain and Ireland	1,031,082	645,651	1,439,885	1,084,633	639,568	1,225,873

NOTE.—Ships launched on Great Lakes not included in amount for United States.

Of the five larger shipyards now building steel vessels, the average number of vessels contracted for during the last seven years has been less than two and one-half vessels for each yard per year. Included in this number are five naval vessels, contracts for which were made in 1927. The table below gives the type, number, and tonnage of these vessels:

	Number	Gross tonnage (displacement)
Scout cruisers	5	50,000
Passenger vessels	18	128,647
Combination vessels	4	21,888
Cargo vessels	9	37,758
Tankers	28	245,150
Cable ship and yachts	10
Dredges and cutters	12

The following table shows the total shipbuilding activities of five of the larger shipyards on the east coast of the United States on January 1, 1928, which has been only slightly improved since that date:

Aside from Government vessels, only two of these vessels are seagoing, the others are for bay or harbor service. Two of the three larger private shipyards equipped for building naval vessels, according to a recent report, employ less than 2,000 workmen each. For normal and economical operation each yard should employ not less than from 3,500 to 5,000 workmen.

Prior to the war the large shipyards of the United States had been principally engaged in building naval vessels. From 75 to 80 per cent of the naval vessels of the United States had been built in private shipyards. The facilities of the larger shipyards were installed primarily to construct and equip naval vessels, and the technical and mechanical organization were largely trained to design and construct such vessels.

Four of the larger shipyards were at that time largely engaged in naval construction. Since the reduction in armament conference, in 1921, the only contracts for the construction of naval vessels that have been awarded to private builders are for five scout cruisers. The larger yards have lost, therefore, the back log on which they depended before the war to maintain their organizations. There has never been sufficient high-grade commercial work in any of our private shipyards to maintain the size or character of organizations necessary to design and build naval vessels. This type of organization can only be preserved by designing and building such vessels.

There had been no merchant shipbuilding of consequence for the foreign trade for many years. The building of merchant vessels had been confined, as now, to vessels for the coastal and intercoastal trade and to miscellaneous small crafts for sound, bay, and harbor service.

The absence of shipbuilding has not only reduced working forces and organizations of existing shipyards, but it has resulted in the closing of many yards. At the beginning of 1916 there were 23 private shipyards in the United States building sea-going vessels. At the present time only 12 are making any pretense of maintaining an organization to build such vessels, and several of these are engaged almost wholly in ship-repair work. Among the yards that have been closed are such well-known yards as those of William Cramp & Son Ship & Engine Building Co.; Bath Iron Works, Bath, Me., which has been recently reopened; Sparrows Point plant, in Maryland; Harlan plant, in Wilmington, Del.; and Alameda plant, in Alameda, Calif., of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co. It is interesting to note, in comparison with the above, that Great Britain has no less than 57 shipyards now building sea-going vessels, and Germany has 18. Of the private shipyards in the United States that were building naval vessels prior to the World War, only 4 have maintained their organizations, 3 for building all types of naval vessels, and 1 for submarines only.

The important part performed by naval contracts in the maintenance of the shipbuilding industry in four of the larger shipyards in the United States on December 31, of each of the years of 1911, 1912, and 1913, is shown on the attached statement, Exhibit "A." The same statement shows the lack of such contracts on December 31, of each of the years of 1926 and 1927, and on October 31, 1928.

The highest grade of work that a shipyard can perform is the construction of naval vessels. The performance of work of this character is ultimately dependent upon the maintenance of a highly developed technical staff by engineers and designers, which can only be created and maintained by building naval vessels. There is no type of merchant vessel construction that requires so highly developed a technical staff as that of naval construction.

The technical staff can only live and thrive in a shipbuilding establishment continuously employed on naval work or the highest grade commercial work, such as large passenger vessels, and where opportunity to undertake the construction of new types is frequently available, so that each ship represents a progressive improvement over the last. This is the only way that progress can be made.

The technical staffs of the private shipyards are, therefore, the neck of the bottle in all shipbuilding, and particularly so in building naval ships on account of their exacting requirements. These staffs, representing the result of many years of trial and elimination of men to build them up, would be disbanded if the private shipyards were obliged to close through lack of naval work. Once disbanded, they could only be very slowly reassembled. The maintenance of a competent technical staff, therefore, depends upon a shipyard having continuous naval or high-grade commercial work. Should the Navy Department award a contract to a shipyard whose technical staff had been disintegrated owing to lack of work, the shipyard could not construct such a vessel for several years owing to the necessity for reassembling, building up by a process of trial and elimination, and final seasoning of a new technical staff before the detail, designs, and plans could be made.

Without these technical staffs of the private shipyards the Navy would be limited to duplicating ships already built whose plans had already been made. Progress would stop.

In conclusion and as a summary of its objections to the Dallinger amendment to the bill authorizing the construction of additional naval vessels, the National Council of American Shipbuilders submits the following:

"(1) By virtue of his office, the Secretary of the Navy has a comprehension of the naval vessels required by the United States and should appreciate the essential necessity of maintaining the private shipyards as auxiliaries of the navy yards. He is familiar with the facilities of the navy yards and private shipyards and is in a position to ascertain the amount of work on hand in the private shipyards and their need of additional work sufficient to employ normal staffs of designers and engineers and forces of skilled mechanics to enable them to perform efficiently their national service as auxiliaries of the navy yards.

"Therefore, whenever Congress authorizes the construction of naval vessels the Secretary of the Navy should have the authority to consider the conditions of the private shipyards and to exercise his discretion whether the construction of naval vessels should be undertaken by private shipyards or by navy yards. The Dallinger amendment deprives the Secretary of the Navy of this authority and discretion.

"(2) The cost of the construction of a cruiser in a Government navy yard is greater than in a private shipyard.

"(3) The Government, by its increasing tendency to build more and more naval vessels in its navy yards, threatens the destruction of private shipyards as naval auxiliaries.

"As a general policy the National Council of American Shipbuilders is opposed to the Government competing with its citizens in business, although it recognizes that the practice of the Government has been to build a few naval vessels in its navy yards, and it is not opposing this practice. It is, however, opposing the Dallinger amendment because, if the cruiser bill be enacted with the amendment, it will result in an unnecessary and uneconomic extension of the practice of the Government of building a few vessels in navy yards to its building a greater number at a time when shipbuilding in the United States is at the lowest ebb of its existence.

"(4) The President of the United States and the President elect have definitely expressed their attitude on the subject of government in business. The President at the Union League Club, Philadelphia, on November 17, 1927, said:

"'It would be entirely wrong to assume that our present position has been secured as a result of accident. It has come from a carefully thought out policy, which has been for the most part consistently followed. We have always held very strongly to the theory that in our country, at least, more could be accomplished for human welfare through encouragement of private initiative than through Government action. We have sought to establish a system under which the people would control the Government and not the Government control the people. If economic freedom vanishes, political freedom becomes nothing but a shadow. It has, therefore, been our wish that the people of the country should own and conduct all gainful service. When the Government once enters a business it must occupy the field alone. No one can compete with it. The result is a paralyzing monopoly.'

"Hon. Herbert Hoover in his acceptance of the presidential nomination said:

"'Government should not engage in business in competition with its citizens. Such actions extinguish the enterprise and initiative which has been the glory of America and which has been the root of its preeminence among the nations of the earth.'

"The National Council of American Shipbuilders therefore recommends that the Dallinger amendment be eliminated from the pending bill (H. R. 11526) authorizing the construction of 15 light cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier."

QUINCY, MASS., December 18, 1928.

Hon. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH,
Member of Congress:

Quincy does not indorse the Dallinger provision in the naval bill. Sincerely hope that you may use your good offices to help the workers in the private yards. With unemployment acute in New England, the shipyard workers in the Fore River plant should be given consideration in new bill.

THOMAS J. MCGRATH, Mayor.

IN COUNCIL, CITY OF QUINCY, December 17, 1928.

Whereas the Fore River Shipbuilding Corporation, an industry of Quincy, has successfully built 163 of the finest warships of our Navy; and

Whereas this shipyard is and has been of great value to our Nation in time of war and peace; and

Whereas this plant employs many residents of Quincy; and

Whereas the naval bill, authorizing the construction of 15 cruisers and 1 aircraft carrier, at an estimated cost of $274,000,000, is now before the Senate committee of our National Government with an amendment, known as the Dallinger amendment, which provides that eight of these ships be built in Government navy yards: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the city council of Quincy records itself opposed to the Dallinger amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Senators WALSH and GILLETT and Representative WIGGLESWORTH, of Massachusetts.

Adopted December 17, 1928.

Congressman RICHARD WIGGLESWORTH:

Quincy Chamber of Commerce wishes to go on record protesting against Dallinger amendment. Letter of details follows.

HARRY H. KERR, President.

[From the Quincy Board of Trade Bulletin, week of December 21–28]

S O S CALL IS FORWARDED TO CONGRESS—QUINCY TRADE BOARD PROTESTS DALLINGER AMENDMENT—CALL CRUISER BILL UNFAIR—WOULD BE HARDSHIP FOR FORE RIVER BUILDERS, CLAIM

Aroused to decisive action by a news dispatch from Washington acquainting them with the effect on steel shipbuilding of the Dallinger amendment to the pending cruiser bill, the Quincy Point Board of Trade, on Wednesday evening, passed a resolution urging that the amendment be stricken from the bill by the Senate.

President William M. Prime was in the chair with J. M. Spence, secretary.

The resolution as unanimously passed by the board follows:

"Resolved, That President Coolidge, in recommending the passage of legislation necessary for the early construction of 15 cruisers has acted with the utmost discretion as a means of strengthening the Nation's defense.

"Resolved further, That the Fore River Plant of the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation (Ltd.), after a period of postwar struggle, is sorely in need of new work to keep an efficient organization of steel shipbuilders employed at the port of Quincy; be it further

"Resolved, That the Dallinger amendment to the pending cruiser bill in the United States Senate, which calls for the building in navy yards of a major portion of these ships, as published in the Quincy Evening News on Wednesday, is undesirable and opposed to the Nation's best interests: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the Quincy Point Board of Trade, at our regular meeting on Wednesday, December 12, go on record as opposing the passage of this bill unless the Dallinger amendment be stricken out. It is further

"Resolved, That we notify our Congressman, RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH, and our Senators, DAVID I. WALSH and FREDERICK H. GILLETT, of our action and ask their support."

BRAINTREE BOARD OF TRADE,
Braintree, Mass., December 20, 1928.

Hon. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The members of the Braintree Board of Trade are strongly opposed to the Dallinger amendment to the naval bill.

We believe that navy yards should be responsible for maintenance and repairs of existing naval vessels only.

During the past two years many of our citizens have been laid off for lack of work at the Fore River plant, Quincy, Mass., and there is good reason to believe that there will be a further reduction.

The existence of this plant, which has built 163 ships for the Navy, should not be jeopardized by putting new construction in navy yards.

Past history has proven conclusively that private shipyards are an absolute necessity to our Government.

We respectfully request that you make every endeavor to assist in defeating this amendment.

Yours very truly,

E. E. ABERCROMBIE, Jr., Secretary.

WEYMOUTH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE (INC.),
East Weymouth, Mass., January 3, 1929.

Hon. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH,
United States Representative,
440 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE WIGGLESWORTH: The Weymouth Chamber of Commerce respectfully invites your attention to the bill now pending in Congress, which would in effect provide for the construction of United States cruisers exclusively in Government navy yards. We believe that the passage of such legislation would be very unfortunate. Of course, the town of Weymouth has a direct interest in the prosperity and volume of business available for the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation (Ltd.), located on the Weymouth Fore River.

The amount of work that is done at this yard has a direct bearing upon the prosperity of all tradespeople and other industries in our vicinity, because the pay roll distributed by the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation is to a very large extent expended in the neighboring municipalities. We also feel that if the Government abandons the construction of naval vessels in private shipyards and places this work exclusively in navy yards it will destroy the most necessary and effective protection and security that this country could have in the time of war.

Obviously, a private shipyard can not afford to maintain the particular employees, organization, and apparatus necessary for the construction of Government ships, unless it receives sufficient contracts from the Government to make it possible to do so. Therefore, in time of war nothing but the Navy will be prepared to construct war vessels for the Government. We think this would be extremely dangerous. The World War is too recent to cause us to forget that ships were the thing that was most necessary and yet most lacking.

To discard our private shipyards as a source of supply of Government war vessels would seem to us to be an undertaking attended by the utmost hazard, and a position that we do not believe this country ought to take. It appears to us that the better policy would be to give these private shipyards sufficient business to enable them to keep their organization, equipment, machinery, and personnel up to the very highest standard. If this is done, a security for adequate defense will be provided.

More than that, there is a real question of how much advantage really results to the citizens of this country from the construction of these ships in Government yards. Such construction, undoubtedly, costs much more (if figured upon a basis of computation that reflects true costs) than if they were constructed in private yards. These excess costs must be made up in some form by the taxpayers. It may perhaps help one class, but to the detriment of another.

We are unable, therefore, to see any real advantage in depriving the private shipbuilding companies of the contracts for the construction of these cruisers. We sincerely hope that you will find it compatible with the interests of the country to oppose the pending legislation.

Respectfully,

STANLEY HEALD,
President Weymouth Chamber of Commerce (Inc.).

BROCKTON, MASS., January 7, 1929.

Congressman RICHARD WIGGLESWORTH,
House Office Building:

Please enter protest of city of Brockton against naval bill amendment requiring all construction and repair work of new naval program to be done in Government yards. We believe naval construction and repair at Fore River yards, Bethlehem Shipbuilding Co., always has been economical and efficient. Share of this work should be open to bids of Fore River yards in interest of Brockton and district employees.

HAROLD D. BENT, Mayor.

BOSTON, MASS., December 20, 1928.

Hon. RICHARD WIGGLESWORTH,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We understand Dallinger amendment to naval cruiser bill provides for building six scout cruisers in navy yards. May we invite your attention to fact that to-day there are only three private shipyards in United States that can undertake large naval work, and unless these yards are kept alive by these naval contracts one or more of them will probably meet the fate of other shipyards that have passed out of existence in recent years. Such loss of this industry might well become of national importance. We, therefore, wish to record our protest against Dallinger amendment and to bespeak your interest and support of proposition that contracts for building new cruisers be given private shipbuilding concerns and navy-yard work be confined to reconditioning, maintaining, and repairing Navy fleet.

FRANK S. DAVIS,
Manager Maritime Association, Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, at the outset of my remarks let me congratulate the Subcommittee on Naval Affairs for their intelligent and able handling of the naval appropriations; so much so that there is hardly any controversy on the bill now pending before the House.

The interest of the country at the present time is concentrated on our sister body, which is considering the 15-cruiser bill. I voted for that measure when it was in the House. I shall vote for the 15-cruiser bill again if it comes back from the other body, but I would oppose the time limit. I think the time limit is unnecessary and unprecedented. I think it is simply tying the hands of the Chief Executive. It shows a lack of confidence and faith in both President Coolidge and the incoming President, Mr. Hoover, and in my opinion it would restrict and hamper Mr. Hoover in calling a conference to further limit the so-called light cruisers. Further on in the time allotted to me I intend to speak in favor of calling another conference to try to reach an agreement to establish a limitation on these so-called light cruisers, which, of course, are not light at all. They are 10,000 tons. They have 8-inch guns, which have a greater hitting power than the old 12-inch guns. They are more powerful than the battleships of 25 years ago and cost more.

Before discussing the question of another conference, I would like to defend in this House—I propose to do it now and each year hereafter, if necessary—and answer the pernicious attacks made against the Limitation of Armament Conference of 1921–22, held here in Washington under the Harding administration. For some reason it has become almost a popular sport to denounce that conference, to say that it was a farce and a fraud and practical treason to the Government. These charges were not made at the time, but have developed since. We must not forget that our delegates were Secretary Hughes, Senator Lodge, and Senator Underwood—three of the ablest Americans holding public office. Senator Lodge was one of our foremost statesmen, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, a man who had always stood for a big navy and for adequate naval appropriations; and the Democratic Party was represented by one of the ablest men that ever sat in this House or in the Senate, former Senator Underwood. He knew all about the appropriations for the Navy from his long and conspicuous service in this House and in the Senate, and had followed the naval program closely for a great many years. Both of these Senators were American patriots, and they were not fooled by foreign influences and they were not a party to selling out our country and scrapping real battleships in return for blue prints.

That is what the big-navy men, my friends, want you to believe at the present time—that our delegates, along with former Secretary Hughes, were fooled and deceived into scrapping real battleships, those already built or in process of building, in exchange for blue prints by Great Britain and Japan.

I would like anybody who is interested in this question to go back and read the speeches made by former Senator Underwood and former Senator Lodge in March, 1922, showing definitely how the 5–5–3 ratio was reached and what battleships were sunk by Great Britain and Japan and what were destroyed by ourselves. Great Britain sank 22 battleships and Japan sank 16, and they were not blue prints, as some big-navy men would have you believe to-day. In my opinion, these wild charges are nothing but propaganda in an effort to undermine the faith of the American people in international conferences to limit naval armaments.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I will later on.

The thinking people of America believed then and still believe that the Washington conference was the greatest step forward in the direction of peace that had been taken since the World War or up to the signing of the Kellogg multilateral treaty.

What happened? Almost overnight by the adoption of a policy to reduce naval armaments proportionately, by the adoption of the 5–5–3 ratio for capital ships all talk and thought of war between the United States and Japan disappeared. The papers were filled with it up to the time of the Washington conference; and just as soon as the conference adopted the 5–5–3 ratio all this talk of war disappeared from our press and from the floors of the Congress of the United States. For the first time in history Great Britain, which had ruled the seas for centuries, agreed to a naval parity with the United States. This was the first time she had ever conceded equality on the high seas to another nation since the Spanish Armada, and she agreed to naval parity because she realized that we had become a great commercial, industrial, and exporting nation, and entitled to a large navy to protect our commerce in all corners of the world.

By the establishment of the 5–5–3 limitation on capital ships Great Britain showed a willingness to change her famous song, Britannia Rules the Wave, and agree to naval parity with the United States. On what? On battle cruisers and on battleships above 10,000 tons, and that was adopted by the acceptance of the 5–5–3 ratio, and Japan came into it. As a result capital ships were sunk on all sides. We were left with 18 capital ships; Great Britain with 20, but she will eventually have 18; and Japan was left with 10. No one has violated the spirit or the letter of that agreement for limitation on capital ships. That agreement not only brought about genuine friendship with Japan but also with England and did away with naval competition as far as the great battleships were concerned, those that cost from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000.

The principle of proportional limitation of naval armament was established for the first time in the history of the world by peaceful and mutual agreements. That was the outstanding result, but, if you want to discuss the financial side, the Washington Conference on Naval Limitation saved us over $200,000,000 a year since that time, or over a billion and a half up to date. Yet there are men going around to-day, big militarists, saying that former Secretary Hughes was a pacifist and implying at the same time that Senator Lodge and Senator Underwood were pacifists also, and had practically committed treason against our country. So it is time that somebody in this Congress should not only defend the principle involved in the 5–5–3 ratio and pay tribute to the wisdom of our American delegates for promoting peace and good will among the leading naval powers but also to point out that the American delegates did everything they could at that conference to bring about a limitation of light cruisers under 10,000 tons, and of submarines and of all other auxiliary vessels under 10,000 tons. But unfortunately Great Britain and France were not ready or willing to go that far. However, our delegates made a concrete offer and did everything within their power to extend the 5–5–3 ratio to naval vessels under 10,000 tons.

Now, since that date Great Britain—and it is just as well to tell the truth, because we are not going to have any war; it is inconceivable that we will go to war with Great Britain—has gone ahead ruthlessly to build light cruisers and has taken advantage of the fact that no agreement was reached to limit light cruisers. They have not violated the letter of the Washington agreement, but they have gone right ahead building these light cruisers, so that now they have 64 light cruisers built or in process of building. That is why our hand is forced. That is why we have to build 15 light cruisers that we do not need. We only need them because England has brutally gone ahead with the building of light cruisers ever since the conference, as the result of which Japan has followed suit and has 33 light cruisers. So we have to appropriate $270,000,000 for more light cruisers that we do not need in order to keep our end up in this naval race. When anybody says to you this is not naval competition they do not know what they are talking about. We are only building because we are forced to by naval competition. Against whom is Great Britain building light cruisers in such large numbers except the United States, and we in turn are paying back the compliment; even a blind man can see this deplorable situation. It is naval competition that has been and always will be one of the major factors in bringing about war. It is what brought about the war between Great Britain and Germany in 1914. Back in the nineties Germany and Great Britain were the best of friends, but just as soon as Germany announced its big naval program it began to cause bitterness, bad feeling, enmity, and hostility that led to war and was bound to eventuate in war. We are not going to have war with Great Britain, because it is inconceivable and everybody knows that such a war would mean the destruction of what is left of civilization, with nothing to be gained. But at the same time let us place the responsibility where it belongs for this naval competition. The responsibility belongs purely to the British Government, to the Tory government that is in power, which really is against any parity or equality with the United States. They still believe that Britannia rules the waves and still insist that if they can not rule through big battleships and battle cruisers they are going to rule it through light cruisers and other forms of naval armament not prohibited by the Washington conference.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. For a brief question.

Mr. DENISON. If that is true, and I am inclined to agree with the gentleman, does not the gentleman think that we should build these cruisers as soon as possible?

Mr. FISH. I am in favor of building the 15 light cruisers. I have voted for every adequate proposal for naval preparedness that has come to the House; I voted for the elevation of guns and for the construction of cruisers against the wishes of President Coolidge a few years ago and I am in favor of the 15 cruisers now. Of course, I was against the preposterous proposition that was presented by the Secretary of the Navy to the Naval Affairs Committee in favor of 71 vessels, which, thank goodness, has been scrapped, but I am opposed to the time limit, first, because it is unprecedented and I do not believe we should tie the hands of the President, but more than that, because I am in favor of calling another conference this year to extend the 5–5–3 ratio to light cruisers. I earnestly hope that President Hoover will call such a conference some time this fall to be held in Washington to consider establishing a limitation on light cruisers. I am in favor of letting him have the power to say whether these 15 cruisers are to be begun this year, if there were enough yards in which to build them, but we should not tie his hands and say they must all be begun in three years. If a time limit were fixed, then you would have to go right ahead with their building, whether we had a conference or not, and the main reason I am speaking here now is, first, in defense of the limitation of armament conference held in Washington in 1922.

Secondly, because I am in favor of another conference to limit light cruisers to be held in Washington at the call of the President this year, and I am sure in my heart that the English people and the British people themselves want this limitation. It is only a small handful of men belonging to the old order of things, the so-called die-hards, who do not represent all the Conservative Party by a long ways in England; but these men as long as they are alive want to see England dominating the waves and until they are dead politically they are going to maintain that principle and therefore I hope that a resolution such as the one I am about to read will be adopted. I do not believe we can get it on this bill because a point of order would be made against it or that we have time to get it through before we adjourn, but I would like to get it through the next Congress, if there is any possibility of doing it:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that the President call a conference of the leading naval powers, including Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy, to be held in Washington during 1929, to consider further limitation of naval armament, with particular reference to light cruisers and all other naval vessels of 10,000 tons or under.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I can not yield. I have not enough time. If I should have any time left I will be pleased to yield.

In addition to the criticism and the persistent and the consistent attacks upon the achievements of the Limitation of Naval Armament Conference of 1922, there have been persistent criticisms of our delegates, Admiral Hilary Jones, and Ambassador Gibson, for failing to reach an agreement in the conference called at the instance of President Coolidge in June, 1927, at Geneva.

If you will study what happened at that conference you will find that the British delegates insisted that the United States agree to give up the 8-inch guns on the light cruisers, and if the United States delegates had agreed to that it would have simply meant that Great Britain, with its enormous merchant marine could have armed every one of them with a 6-inch gun and controlled the seas forever. That is what was behind the British demand, the sine qua non of the British naval authorities; and our delegates, thank God, stood up and refused to surrender, because if they had there never would have been any parity or equality between the United States and Great Britain on the high seas for generations to come; and yet there are men in this House and in the press and throughout the country who have attacked our delegates for failure to reach an agreement. I am in favor of the principle of calling conferences, more conferences, and still more conferences, because the people of England are the same kind of people we have here. They want peaceful relations between Great Britain and the United States. They want to do away with this naval competition. They want to do away with this endless burden of taxation, and if Mr. Hoover, when he becomes President, calls such a conference to meet here in Washington, I believe that the delegates from Great Britain, Japan, and the United States can agree to some tonnage limitation, say 300,000 tons, on light cruisers.

Personally, I do not care exactly what the tonnage limitation is as long as there is a limitation, because it is only through limitation that we can do away with the rivalry brought about by naval competition which is existing to-day. It is going on at this very minute, in spite of these beautiful phrases you see about the friendship of the United States to Great Britain and of the United States to Japan. We are entering, we have entered, and we are now in naval competition with Great Britain and Japan, and this will continue just as long as there is no tonnage or other kind of limitation established for light cruisers.

It ought to be an easy matter to call this conference and extend the 5–5–3 ratio to light cruisers and other auxiliary vessels under 10,000 tons or provide for a tonnage limitation.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. The gentleman has referred to the proposal to build these 15 cruisers as entering into competition with Great Britain. I would like to ask the gentleman how he figures there would be any competition involved, in view of his statement that since the naval conference in 1922 Great Britain has either laid down or built 62 cruisers?

Mr. FISH. Sixty-four.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. If that is so, how does the gentleman figure that building 15 cruisers is competition?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. All the 64 British cruisers are not 10,000-ton cruisers, and they do not all carry 8-inch guns. These modern cruisers we are providing are 10,000-ton cruisers, and they do carry the big 8-inch guns, and that will give us approximately 33 cruisers altogether and 23 modern 10,000-ton cruisers with 8-inch guns. They may not be equal to the 64 in numbers, but they approximate the naval strength of the British cruisers.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The number of cruisers that Great Britain has laid down since the disarmament conference is 15.

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman has brought that out. That is the number laid down. I think England has authorized some more, too.

Mr. TABER. There are more authorized, but the rest of the 64 that she has in commission are older.

Mr. FISH. That answers the question—they are older. These new vessels we are putting down or authorizing, making about 33 all together since the armistice, are not possibly equal to all the 64 British cruisers combined but they approximate that strength, because the British cruisers are older and have lighter gun power in many cases.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. There are only 8 laid down and under construction with 8-inch guns at the present time, and 15 provided by this bill.

Mr. FISH. Yes; the other 10 have smaller tonnage and smaller guns.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Making a total of 23 with 8-inch guns.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Does not the gentleman think that if we go ahead and authorize these additional cruisers and let the world know that we mean business by putting a time limit in the legislation, we will be more apt to get another limitation of armament conference than if we merely authorize the blue prints?

Mr. FISH. No; I do not think so at all. The Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy is the President of the United States. We ought to have confidence and faith in him, and certainly we Republicans should have faith in our own President.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has no more confidence in the new President than I have.

Mr. FISH. I know that; I am not casting any reflections.

Mr. DENISON. I was wondering in view of the fact that we are already constructing additional cruisers, and if we are going to add 15 more——

Mr. FISH. Not at all. The President has authority to go ahead, and might go ahead quicker than the time limit. He might construct them in two years. It might serve his purpose to say if you do not agree in this conference in 1929 we will build these cruisers in 18 months. I think he can do that, not only to bring about the conference—but to get results. Moreover, this proposed time limit comes pretty near being a lack of confidence in the Commander in Chief.

Now, a naval limitation conference is to be called April 15 under the auspices of the League of Nations. I introduced last year a resolution authorizing $75,000 to send delegates to a similar conference under the League of Nations. It was repeatedly said then that the proposed conference would be a farce. In my heart I knew that was so, but I advocated it on the floor of the House as a matter of good faith for the United States to send delegates and participate in any bona fide efforts to limit naval armaments.

What happened? The resolution went through, and the delegates were sent to the league conference, which turned out to be a mere gesture if not a farce, as a lot of little nations without any navies took part and effectively prevented the leading naval powers reaching any agreements. Often one little nation without a navy objected and that was the end of the whole proceedings. Or groups of European nations would line up on every question, not on the merits of the proposal but on the basis of understandings and ententes.

You must remember that Article V of the League of Nations requires unanimous consent and if any gentleman in the assembly or the council of the league objects, that ends the proceedings. I only wish to God that they might come to some limitation under the league. But I feel reasonably certain that the new conference will not amount to any more than the old conference held in the spring of 1927.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I thoroughly sympathize with the gentleman in his views on disarmament, but how is the gentleman going to get an agreement unless it is unanimous? You can not make a nation disarm.

Mr. FISH. That is a fair question; but the conferences that we have called in the past only included the leading naval powers. If a naval limitation conference were called this year in Washington it would probably be confined to Great Britain, the United States, Japan, Italy, and France, with some chance of reaching an agreement; but if you go ahead and include Poland, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia, and even smaller countries, it is ridiculous on the face of it to expect any results from such a conference. I thank the chairman for the time he has given me, and I hope the chairman himself will help bring about an extension of the 5-5-3 ratio to light cruisers and other auxiliary vessels under 10,000 tons. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] such time as he desires.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend at this time to make any statement, but I will take a few minutes to correct some inaccuracies, or perhaps I should say incomplete statements, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]. An incomplete statement is an inaccurate statement. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] stated that some two years ago he voted to override the recommendation of the President of the United States in which the President requested Congress to postpone appropriations for the construction of cruisers already authorized. The reason assigned by the President for asking a postponement of such appropriations was that he intended in the very near future to ask for a conference with Great Britain, Italy, France, and Japan.

Later on the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] states that the Secretary of the Navy submitted a preposterous proposal for a building program after the failure of the conference called by the President.

The gentleman is inaccurate in confining his statement to the fact that it was the Secretary of the Navy who submitted what he terms a "preposterous proposal." This proposal of the Secretary of the Navy, he will find on inquiry, was made with the full knowledge and approval of the President. It would not have been made by the Secretary of the Navy and would not have been considered in extenso by the Naval Affairs Committee had they not been informed that it met with the approval of the President and was not in conflict with the financial program of the Budget. The surprising thing is that the President, who shortly before had opposed any appropriation for building cruisers then authorized, so soon after the failure of the conference called by him was submitting what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and many others have rightly characterized as a preposterous proposal. Leading friends of the President on the Naval Affairs Committee were of the opinion that the recommendation of this "preposterous building program," without any suggestion as to when the building of any of the ships so recommended would be started, was nothing more than an idle, blueprint proposal. It was largely because of this prevailing belief that the House committee wrote into the bill authorizing the building of 15 cruisers a time limit. In effect, they said, "No; this proposal of the President, rightly characterized by the press of the Nation and by the Members of Congress as preposterous and unreasonable, we disapprove; but since, Mr. President, you admit and show the urgent need for more cruisers, and since the House, by affirmative vote before the Senate took action, approved your suggestion to defer appropriations until the conference could be held; and since now you propose a large building program, which the country does not favor, yet does favor, as Congress does, a reasonable building program, we will provide for such a building program and require it to be laid down within a definite time."

That is the history of the 15-cruiser construction program, and I am in position to make such statement for the reason that, serving with the subcommittee when the suggestion was first made that we defer any appropriations for cruisers then authorized, I said to the committee, "I will not consent to defer such appropriations unless assured that the President of the United States makes the request, and makes it for the plainly declared purpose of asking a conference with Great Britain, Japan, France, and Italy with a view of placing further limitations on naval armaments."

If you will refer to a speech in support of the position afterwards taken by our subcommittee, at the President's request, you will find that I said then if a conference is called, and there appears no reasonable prospect of an agreement with the nations participating in such conference to further limit armaments, then I favor undertaking at once a construction program that will maintain, approximately at least, that parity of naval power provided for at the Washington naval conference. That is all that this building program now pending in the Senate seeks to do. It is, in fact, a replacement program, as stated by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] on yesterday, since there must soon go out of commission, because of obsolescence, many cruisers now carried on our list as ships of some military value. As these 15 cruisers come into service, I agree with the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] that old ones found to be obsolescent should not be kept in active commission thereafter.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman has been on this committee for some time. I have a great deal of respect for his judgment. I want to know whether the gentleman does not think that it is better policy for us as a Government to map out our program for our naval expenditures and go ahead and build the ships, rather than to authorize them with some sort of a condition depending upon calling some sort of a conference? It seems to me that that is in the nature of a bluff, and I never did approve of that, either as a personal matter or as a Government matter. It seems to me we ought to authorize these cruisers and then we ought to go on and build them.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the gentleman is entirely correct. And may I say this, that Great Britain, at the conference to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] referred, opposed the building of any cruisers of the types which the gentleman from New York rightly says we can not forego building, because if we submit to the proposal of Great Britain by a further limitation as to tonnage and gun power of light cruisers, then you, in fact, have no limitation, because within the limits proposed by Great Britain the merchant marine becomes a competitor, and we know the superior strength of the British Government as to a merchant marine. That is why our naval officers wisely concluded that so long as Great Britain was insistent that we accede to the conditions and limitations she proposed, there could be no conference, and I think the American people have given hearty approval to this position taken by our naval officers.

What is happening? This branch of Congress, by a large vote, with the approval of the American people, has authorized a 15-cruiser building program, to be laid down within the next three years. It is a reasonable replacement program, and with the completion of that program, we still will be weaker in cruiser strength than Great Britain; why, then, should we hesitate to go on with the program? The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] has given serious study to the question, and his speech yesterday was one evidencing sound economic thought as to replacements. He feels that the 15-cruiser building program is entirely consonant with sound economic reasons for a replacement of old cruisers soon to become obsolescent, and he undertook to point out how we may in the future practice economy by wisely following some safe and sound replacement program of this kind. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS] such time as he desires.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks, and in doing so to incorporate therein part of a speech which I made in 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks and incorporate therein part of a speech which he made in 1922. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am indeed grateful to the membership of this House for the opportunity of addressing you this afternoon.

On the 4th of March I will have served my people and our State in Congress for 14 years, and I appreciate to the fullest extent so signal an honor.

Forty-eight years ago my father moved to Kissimmee, Fla., and there I have resided ever since. For more than twenty times I have gone before those good people asking their support, and I am proud of the fact that I can say I have never lost my home precinct and only my home county one time, the year I returned from college. Those people knew me as a child, a boy, and all during manhood. That they have always so loyally supported me is appreciated more than I can express. I can only say they have been more kind to me than I deserve, and my only hope is I merit their confidence and esteem.

Last June I failed of nomination, but do not consider it a defeat. Two years ago, with the same candidate opposing me, I received 22,000 votes and was renominated. At that time there were only two candidates in the race, and my opponent then was the one who defeated me this time. Last June I received 42,000 votes, or nearly 100 per cent increase, but failed to receive the nomination. More than 56,000 voted in the district for the first time and the total vote cast at the primary was over 98,000. I simply refer to this to show you my friends are not only still loyal but that they persuaded 20,000 who did not know me to vote for me.

I have another unique record. While I have been elected to Congress seven times I have made 14 races, 2 every 2 years, except possibly one time. Those of you who keep up with athletics know that the legs of Wagner and Cobb finally gave way and they retired from the game. Perhaps I made so many races is the reason why I did not run fast enough the last time. But enough of this, for perhaps it does not interest you.

In every public address I have made in the district I stated I did not care who received the credit so long as the fourth congressional district and our beloved State, Florida, received the benefit. Therefore, I have neither sought nor received publicity. I am satisfied to let my record and the future determine whether I have been faithful and efficient.

In view of the charge repeatedly made, Mr. Chairman, that I have accomplished nothing since I have been in Congress, I think it but fair to myself to briefly refer to a few of the major measures which I have advocated and pushed to a successful conclusion. This is done with no egotism, because there is no egotism in my make-up. With you, as with them, I have always been just "Joe."

I do so solely that in years to come, perhaps, after I have passed to the great beyond, my friends can refer to my record and say that their support was justified.

When I entered Congress the St. Johns River from Jacksonville to the ocean only had a depth of 25 feet, the depth of a river being determined by the most shallow point. By hard work, and a never-say-die spirit, I am glad to state that now there is a depth from Jacksonville to the ocean of 30 feet, and at Mayport a lightship is stationed and complete jetties have been constructed.

At Miami there was a depth of about 10 feet, and this was gradually filled up until the City of Miami was forced to be taken off her run. Year in and year out I fought for Miami, because I appreciated the possibilities of that magic city, and to-day there is a depth of 25 feet and an authorization to complete the channel and harbor to a depth of 30 feet.

Fort Pierce, West Palm Beach, Hollywood, and other cities have spent and are spending millions of dollars constructing their harbors without a single dollar from the Government. At Hollywood in the near future there will be completed a harbor of practically 35-foot depth at a cost of approximately $6,000,000, paid for by the Joe Young Corporation, the city of Hollywood, and the city of Fort Lauderdale. There are also practically completed harbors at West Palm Beach and Fort Pierce. If I had been permitted to remain in Congress I am satisfied I would have secured for these cities the governmental aid they are entitled to. If Florida had been treated as other States had been treated all of our harbors would have been completed without a dollar of expense to the taxpayers down there; but before I entered Congress the policy of the Government was changed and local cooperation has been required.

More than $18,000,000 has been spent or authorized for improvements in the fourth congressional district. This does not include moneys for good roads. And yet honesty forces me to state many rivers and harbors have been neglected because there are more than 1,500 miles of rivers and about 600 miles of seacoast in the district, extending from Jacksonville to Key West, which I have had the honor to represent. I have been severely criticized because I did not scatter my work and secure a pittance for each harbor, making none complete; but I did not surrender under the pressure, but hewed to the mark, never beginning a new project until an old one had been completed.

I have been a member of the House Committee on Roads for years, and the first bill reported out by the committee was by a majority of 1, and I had the pleasure of voting with the majority, and think I can, therefore, in fairness claim I was instrumental, working with those just as enthusiastic as myself, in embarking the Government on the building of good roads. Since I have been a member of that committee there has been spent by the Government in Florida, in round numbers, $9,000,000, and there is an unobligated balance apportioned to the State of more than $2,000,000, or, in all, approximately $11,000,000 for Government and State aid roads. There will also be an allotment in 1931 under the bill already passed.

In other words, there has been spent more than $18,000,000 in the district, and added to this the more than $11,000,000 spent on public roads, making in all more than $29,000,000 by the Government during my tenure of office, and yet day in and day out, in season and out of season, I was severely and unjustly criticized for not working for Florida and for doing nothing for my constituents.

There is now set aside for the State $4,500,000 for public buildings; so I think I can truthfully say, while some may have been more efficient, none could have more consistently and persistently worked for the State than I have worked.

In fairness to the State, let me remind you these appropriations have been largely made possible because our cities and the State have met the Government practically dollar for dollar on all expenditures.

While I have worked for the fourth congressional district, I have not known congressional lines and have worked just as hard for each and every part of the State. Nationally I have followed the same course, and it has been my pleasure to cooperate with my colleagues from other States in securing appropriations to which I thought they were entitled.

It was my pleasure to serve six years under a Democratic administration. Four years of that time I was chairman of the House Committee on Education—to my mind, one of the most important committees of the House, especially to the youth of the Nation. I am satisfied I can truthfully say during those four years none of my colleagues who served with me on the committee will say I did not act fairly and impartially and that I knew no party lines.

During the last eight years I have served as a member of the minority party. Perhaps the many courtesies and kindnesses shown me by my colleagues on the Republican side is due to the course I pursued as a member of the majority party. This was clearly shown at the last session when I made the fight for the refund to Miami of the money advanced by that city to the Government for harbor improvement.

That fight refunding to Miami $1,105,000, the other $500,000 of the total amount advanced being refunded by the Chief of Engineers, was won because of the support of about 60 of my Republican colleagues, even though I was opposed by the leaders of the House. By securing this refund I saved the taxpayers of Miami alone between forty and sixty thousand dollars, or between four and six years' salary as a Member of Congress.

The fact that Miami did not give me a majority should not be held against the city, for practically all of those who knew of my work loyally stood by me and, unfortunately, in many cases were severely criticized for so doing.

No man likes to lose, but I believe I can truthfully say I harbor no animosity toward anyone who opposed me honestly and legitimately. For those who knowingly and unfairly criticized me I have but the utmost contempt.

Because of the influx of people from other States I doubt if any Member of Congress has secured more aid in the way of special relief bills and pensions for the soldiers of all wars and their widows than I have. While I am a southerner by birth and the son of a Confederate soldier, I am glad I was big enough and broad enough to see that those good people, the majority of whom were Republicans, secured the relief to which they were entitled. Fortunately or unfortunately for myself, they could not assist me in the primary as they did not participate, but in handling claims I have never cared nor have I asked to what party the applicant belonged.

Early in life I selected several mottoes which I have tried to live up to. One of them is:

> If any little word of mine can make some life the brighter;
> If any little song of mine can make some heart the lighter;
> God help me to speak that little word and do my bit of singing;
> And drop them in some lonely vale and start the echoes ringing.

In view of what I have done for those soldiers of all wars I feel that I have lived true to my motto and the thousands of heart beats in Florida for my welfare is sufficient compensation for whatever I may have accomplished for them, and my sole regret is that I was not able to do more.

The foregoing has referred to the wonderful State of Florida, but fate has been exceedingly kind to me and my field, therefore, has been in a broader sense.

As a member of the committee it was my great privilege and pleasure to help perfect and pass the first bill for vocational training, making it possible for the boys and girls of our Nation to learn a trade and thereby make life easier for them, which at its best is a rough and hard road to travel.

Mr. Chairman, I voted for war, although I did all in my power to keep this country of ours out of war, but when I cast my vote I dedicated my heart and soul and the best that was in me to the brave boys who went abroad or remained in the camps at home to help protect and defend our wonderful country and my life and liberty and yours. Therefore, it was with great pleasure that I was permitted as chairman of the committee to introduce and help perfect the first bill for the rehabilitation of disabled soldiers and this bill was passed and out of it has grown that great and wonderful institution, the Veterans' Bureau, which is doing so much for the disabled soldiers. The day has not been too long; the night too dark or stormy for me to comply with all requests received from ex-service men, but for this they owe me nothing. They are under no obligation to me and I retire from Congress feeling that I am indebted to them. The thousands of letters of thanks I have received is sufficient reward for whatever I may have accomplished in their behalf. I have watched the Veterans' Bureau grow until it is the great institution of the Government we find to-day. I have watched directors come and go. The main fault I have to find is that about as soon as a man becomes thoroughly acquainted with the work, possibly for political reasons or otherwise, another takes his place and we again have to go through the same process of building up.

As I will retire shortly from Congress, and therefore can not be accused of having any ulterior motives, I feel it is not inappropriate for me to say I have never found a man more courteous, more competent, or more efficient than General Hines, the present Director of the Veterans' Bureau. I sincerely trust, if he so desires, he will be permitted to remain at his post and continue the wonderful work he is doing for the ex-service men. What I like about him is his frankness. He also has that wonderful faculty of knowing how to deal with men and he does not try to mislead, but gives a positive answer. I like to deal with such men and I again say no more efficient one could be selected for the work which he is doing.

There are many connected with the Veterans' Bureau who have been more than kind to me, and I have found them efficient.

To mention each and every department of the Government is a physical impossibility, besides, time will not permit, but my experience has been that the majority of them are exceedingly courteous, and I shall never forget their cooperation and assistance.

I feel, however, in view of the courteous treatment I have always received, whether their decisions were favorable or unfavorable, I should state I have never found more efficient Government officials than the Chief of Engineers and the other Government engineers of the War Department; also their office assistants. I am satisfied my 14 years' experience with practically every department of the Government and the friendships I have formed there will be of valuable assistance to me in the future and will, at least, be a pleasant memory.

I have compiled a complete statement of my record, but will not ask that it be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for it would take up too much space and the satisfaction of knowing that each one whom I have assisted is familiar with what I have done for him is sufficient.

I shall also not undertake to call attention to the hundreds and, perhaps, thousands of individual cases I have handled for my constituents before the various governmental departments during my tenure of office. The fact that I am a lawyer has made it possible for me to push these claims to a successful conclusion.

My colleagues know the stand I have taken on all taxation matters and such assistance as I have rendered in reducing the taxes, thereby taking off the shoulders of the people a part of the burden under which they were staggering. I sincerely hope at the next session the exemption allowance given both single and married people will be materially increased, for I am satisfied the present exemption is not sufficient. This great Government of ours will not feel the small amount of taxes lost by so doing, and yet it would assist millions who have to use every legitimate means in an effort to make ends meet.

When we were considering the income tax bill during the World War, the bill carried a paragraph making drop letters 3 cents instead of 2. I offered an amendment to the bill, and the amendment was adopted, retaining the postage at 2 cents; and no one can estimate the millions of dollars saved the citizens of the Nation by the adoption of that amendment. In arguing for the adoption of the amendment at that time, May 22, 1917, I said in part as follows:

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, the first amendment I have offered, if passed by this House, will leave the postage exactly as it is now on first-class mail matter. In other words, first-class mail matter will be carried at 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof. I have introduced the amendment because I believe it should be adopted, and I trust this House will agree to it. There is to my mind no excuse for placing upon the people an additional burden of 1 cent an ounce or fractional part thereof when the first-class mail has for past years been paying to this Government $80,000,000 more than it costs the Government to transport it. In talking to a gentleman the other day, he said that this was the most equitable tax in the bill, that everybody paid it, and that he and I were once poor, but that now we could pay it. I want to say that I remember the days when I was poor, and that is why I do not care to place an additional tax on the people, when already they are paying $80,000,000 more than it costs the service they are receiving.

It does not amount to much, my friends, but to my mind when you pay 1 cent extra on first-class mail that is now paying this enormous profit to the Government you are taking from the poor laboring man and the washerwomen and the poorer class of people throughout the country who are not able to buy periodicals the widow's mite to place upon the letter that they may write to their relatives and thus place an extra burden on them, even though that burden may be small. [Applause.]

Mr. MCKENZIE. Is it not a fact that this provision hits the large mail-order houses harder than anyone else?

Mr. SEARS. It does not; because the mail-order houses send out their catalogues under the third-class postage, 2 ounces for 1 cent. Their business is carried to the people, and the people in writing back to the mail-order houses will have to place 3 cents on the letters, and the people pay the freight and the mail-order houses, as usual, escape.

I want to say, briefly, that it looks as though it is useless to appeal to this House unless a lobby is back of a proposition. No one has raised his voice, no one has talked for keeping the first-class mail at the present rate, and not a single Member of this House has received a telegram to keep it at that rate; but I believe, if the past is any criterion, when we reach the next section in this bill, where telegrams have been numerous from our friends back home, we will hear loud talking and much proclaiming that the rate should not be increased; but the poor people in your district, my colleagues, who can not reach you in that way, who know nothing of this tax, and therefore have not wired you, will have raised no sentiment for my amendment. But I want to tell you it is not necessary for them to wire me, and I do not believe it is necessary to wire you. By this no criticism is intended for anyone who writes or wires me. On the contrary, I invite and welcome information.

As to the second amendment, it provides that in cities where there are city carriers the rate shall be 2 cents on first-class matter for each ounce or fractional part thereof. I want to say to the Ways and Means Committee that if you do not adopt that amendment you will lose in revenue. The merchant in your home town, where there is a city carrier, can go out and get a boy, where he has two or three thousand letters to deliver, and deliver those letters at a price less than 2 cents each, and therefore the merchant will not use the mail and will not pay 3 cents on those letters. They are going to use the cheapest way to deliver the mail, and you will find that in these small cities they will employ carriers to deliver their mail once a month instead of delivering same through the post office. If they do use the mails, however, as I stated, that tax will go upon the people that patronize the local grocery or the dry-goods man in your district, and I trust, at least, that the House will remember the people back home that sent them to Congress and not compel them to place a 3-cent stamp on first-class mail matter where it is a drop letter. Again I say to you, you can not defend the placing of 3-cent postage upon first-class mail where it does not go out of your home town and only place a postage of 3 cents on mail that goes from New York to California. I believe that instead of raising the $70,000,000, as estimated by the Committee on Ways and Means, if you do not adopt the second amendment I have offered, the Ways and Means Committee will reduce the postage on drop letters by ten to fifteen million dollars throughout the country. I sincerely trust this amendment will also pass.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Page 51, line 17, after the word 'thereof,' insert:

"'Provided, That the rate of postage on drop letters of the first class shall be 2 cents an ounce or fraction thereof.'

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida, which the Clerk has just reported.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SEARS) there were—ayes 47, noes 21.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. RAINEY and Mr. SEARS to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

I also offered an amendment, which was adopted, eliminating the tax imposed on the annual exhibitions of the firemen and policemen throughout the country, thereby savings thousands of dollars which have gone to the benefit fund for retired policemen and firemen and their widows.

Having worked seven years in a drug store while attending college and after my college course, I knew of the injustice and unfairness of the stamp tax placed on patent medicines and cosmetics. I am glad to state I was instrumental in having this tax removed.

Any druggist can tell you what the adoption of this amendment meant to him.

I have been severely criticized, Mr. Speaker, because I was not active and did not work for Florida and tell of her wonderful advantages. The charge makes me laugh, because I have talked Florida to my colleagues so much that I hardly have the nerve to look them in the face.

When I first entered Congress the population of the fourth congressional district was less than 200,000, and to-day it has grown to over 650,000.

Many of my colleagues have called on me to assist former constituents of theirs, and they know it has always been a pleasure for me to go the limit for them.

So, my colleagues, I could go on all the afternoon calling attention to matters affecting my State and the Nation, but I hope and believe I have already called attention to enough to offset the oft-repeated statement of those who have always opposed me and who have repeatedly stated I have accomplished nothing and that I have loafed on the job.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to impose further on the good nature of the House, but there is also another motto which I have tried to follow:

Have you ever noticed when a fellow dies,
His friends from far and near
All gather round and have nice things to say;
But the dead don't hear.
They bring him flowers made up in wreaths,
That sometimes fill a room;
But the dead don't even get a smell
Of the fragrance they exhume.
So, my friends, if it is just the same to you,
I would rather you would instead
Give me the flowers while I am living,
Use the hammer when I'm dead.

Therefore, I want to say no man could have had a greater honor conferred upon him than the privilege of being a Member of the House of Representatives and serving with the best body of men, mentally, morally, and in every way, taken as a whole, than the membership of this House.

I would like to mention each and every one of you, but you know this is not possible. I will, therefore, say that during the time the Democratic Party was in power there has been no more able and impartial Speaker than the late lamented and beloved Champ Clark, or the Democratic leader, the late Claude Kitchen, or the Republican leader, the late James R. Mann, and this is just as true of the present Speaker and the present majority and minority leaders.

I am proud that I can state while I have had many oral battles on the floor of this Chamber there is not one word or line in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD which reflects on a single Member of Congress, for I do not believe in dealing in personalities. If Members of Congress would be more careful and not reflect on the membership, I am satisfied throughout the country the standing of the House would be increased.

I believe I have the friendship, confidence, and esteem of each and every Member, and what I have accomplished has been due to your cooperation and assistance.

The people have a right to choose the one they believe the best qualified to represent them, and I have never complained but have always cheerfully submitted to the voice of the people.

I do not know what the future holds in store for me, but I shall face it with a bright smile and return to my people with a clear conscience and again have the pleasure of mixing and mingling with them and joining in their efforts to bring before the people of the country the wonderful advantages of our climate and soil.

My sole regret in retiring from this body is the fact that in the future my road and your road will lead in a different direction and that intimate association with you will no longer be permitted me. I do assure you, however, from the bottom of my heart I hope the future holds in store for each and every one of you the best of health, happiness, and success during the years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, during my entire service in Congress I have made every possible effort to wind up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma. The last report of the Secretary of the Interior shows that with the exception of a number of suits brought under jurisdictional acts passed by Congress in 1924 the affairs of all of these tribes, with the exception of the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, have been wound up.

I have cooperated in every possible way with the Members of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress and the Department of the Interior in an effort to have these coal and asphalt deposits sold.

We enacted legislation several years ago authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell these deposits, subject to certain limitations and restrictions named in the act. Many years ago these deposits were appraised. They have been offered for sale a number of times. Only a comparatively small amount of the deposits have been sold.

On January 15, 1929, I pressed the matter of the winding up of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes and particularly the sale of the coal and asphalt deposits of the Choctaws and Chickasaws upon the attention of the Secretary of the Interior in a letter reviewing what had been done and urging upon the Department the importance and advisability of completely winding up the affairs of these tribes and the disposition of these coal and asphalt deposits. I asked to be informed in what way I could cooperate and be of assistance in this, as the following letter indicates:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1929.

Hon. ROY O. WEST,
Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am greatly interested in cooperating in every possible way to assist in winding up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma.

Agreements were entered into between the representatives of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and the commissioners representing the United States on the 23d day of April, 1897, between the representatives of the Creek Nation and the commissioners representing the United States on the 27th day of September, 1897, which agreements were approved by Congress on June 28, 1898. An agreement was made with the representatives of the Seminole Nation on the 16th day of December, 1897, which was approved by Congress on July 1, 1898, and an act was passed by Congress July 1, 1902, submitting to the Cherokee people for ratification, an agreement which was approved by the Cherokee people at an election held on August 7, 1902.

All of these agreements and acts of Congress, supplemental treaties, and amandatory acts of Congress, provided for the making of the tribal rolls, the allotment of the tribal lands in severalty, and the disposition of their money, among the enrolled members of the tribes found entitled thereto.

Your attention is invited to the first paragraph on page 69 of the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, entitled "Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma," which reads in part as follows:

"The remaining tribal property (including amounts uncollected from sales of tribal land and minerals) of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations is valued at $10,444,104. The amounts to be collected from Choctaw and Chickasaw tribal property heretofore sold aggregate $944,754. The present tribal property of the Creek Nation is valued at $92,050, and that of the Seminole Nation at $30,000. The amounts to be collected on Creek tribal property heretofore sold aggregate $27,334. A few small tracts of land belonging to the Cherokee Nation are yet to be disposed of and the sum of $153 remains to be collected on Cherokee tribal property heretofore sold, otherwise the Cherokee tribal affairs, except pending litigation in the United States Court of Claims, are practically closed."

I would appreciate it if you would furnish me with data showing the various items referred to in the above-estimated values of tribal property undisposed of belonging to the respective tribes. Congress has enacted legislation which would enable the department to completely wind up all of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. If any additional legislation is necessary I will be glad to cooperate with the other members of the Oklahoma delegation and the department in securing its enactment.

I think that the members of these tribes, and particularly the members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, have a right to complain against the delay in the winding up of their affairs. They were the first to make agreements with the commissioners representing the United States, in 1897, and this first agreement was ratified by Congress on June 28, 1898, more than 30 years ago. The rolls were completed and closed on or before March 4, 1907, almost 22 years ago. The lands were allotted to the members of these two tribes, and the other members of the other Five Civilized Tribes, and these allotments were completed some 20 years ago. The tribal property referred to, as belonging to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, in the report above referred to, valued at $10,444,104, largely consist of coal and asphalt deposits. Legislation has been enacted from time to time looking to the sale of these coal and asphalt deposits.

I am aware of the fact that these deposits have been offered for sale and that bids have not been received on a large part of these deposits submitting offers which the department felt justified in accepting. These deposits were appraised a number of years ago. Since that time oil and gas have been discovered in great areas and used as a fuel substitute for coal. Coal has also been discovered in large areas in public and private lands in many of the Western States, and these discoveries, and financial difficulties, and other reasons assigned by the department from time to time, are urged as excuses for not winding up the affairs of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes.

Under the jurisdictional acts passed in 1924 all of the Five Civilized Tribes have been authorized to institute suits in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, on all claims which they may have against the Government of the United States. Many of these suits have already been instituted, and it is the hope of the attorneys representing the tribes that they may be brought to trial and finally disposed of within the next two years. In the meantime, the remaining tribal property, including the mineral deposits, belonging to the Choctaws and the Chickasaws should be disposed of.

I wanted to inquire what, if any, effort is being made looking to the disposition of this remaining tribal property and whether anything was done by the department during the past year looking to the disposition of this property? I favor the disposition of the remaining undisposed of tribal property to the very best possible advantage to the tribes, and I have particular reference to the coal and asphalt deposits. I favor this property being advertised as extensively as possible, using the experience of those familiar with the method of advertising public property for sale, and these deposits offered and sold at a time and under circumstances during the calendar year of 1929, which will insure the bringing of the greatest possible amount to the tribes.

If any additional legislation is necessary to effect this sale, I want to be advised and will be glad to actively cooperate with the department and the other members of the Oklahoma delegation to secure its enactment. I do not believe we are justified in further withholding from sale these mineral deposits because the Government has not received an offer approximating the appraised value, made years ago, before the discovery of large quantities of oil and gas and coal throughout the various Western States.

There were 20,799 enrolled members of the Choctaw Tribe and 6,304 enrolled members of the Chickasaw Tribe. The rolls were completed and closed as of date of March 4, 1907. It is estimated that one-third of the original enrolled members of these tribes have since died. The determination of their heirs is an ever-increasing question. In my judgment, the affairs of all of these tribes, except the suits pending and authorized to be instituted under the jurisdictional acts of 1924, should be wound up during the next fiscal year ending on or before June 30, 1930. I want to inquire particularly what, if any, efforts are being made for the sale of the remaining coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, and whether or not the department has in contemplation the sale of these deposits in the near future, and also what, if anything, it is necessary for Congress to do to aid the department in the sale of these deposits, or in any other manner to assist the department in the winding up of the affairs of these tribes.

Very respectfully,

W. W. HASTINGS.

On January 25, 1929, I received a reply from the Secretary of the Interior reviewing the entire matter and inclosing a copy of a draft of a bill suggesting legislation which the department thought would help expedite the sale of these coal and asphalt deposits. The letter reviews the record of what has been done by the department in this matter, and is as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 25, 1929.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Reference is made herein to your letter of January 15, 1929, in which you inquire as to the remaining tribal property of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma and as to what steps are being taken looking to the disposal thereof and the winding up of the tribal affairs.

For your information as to the undisposed-of tribal lands and other property of the Five Civilized Tribes, there are transmitted herewith copies of pages 15 to 22, inclusive, of the annual report of the Five Civilized Tribes Agency for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, containing a statement as to the remaining tribal property of said tribes. It appears therefrom that the tribal lands and property of the Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole Nations have, with the exception of a few tracts, been allotted, sold, or otherwise disposed of as provided by law.

Of the undisposed-of property of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral area of said nations constitute the principal item.

Under the act of Congress approved February 8, 1918 (40 Stat. L. 433), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to appraise and offer for sale the coal and asphalt mineral deposits in the segregated area of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, said coal and asphalt mineral deposits were offered for sale three times and, out of a total of 517 tracts, but 94 tracts were sold.

Under the act of Congress approved February 22, 1921 (41 Stat. L. 1107), authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reappraise and offer for sale the remainder of the segregated coal and asphalt mineral deposits, in accordance with the act of February 8, 1918, as to terms and conditions of payments, a sale was held in 1925, at which time 426 tracts were offered for sale and only 4 were sold. The Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes in his report relative to the sale last above mentioned states as follows:

"This sale was attended by a very few prospective buyers, although the usual plan of advertising of sales had been used by this office—circulars, descriptive advertisements, and notices posted in post offices, banks, and other public places.

"The coal industry in Oklahoma at the present time is in a very bad condition and with but little prospect for improvement for some time to come. Operators are endeavoring to run their mines with non-union men, and, of course, this is causing more or less trouble with the unions. The falling off in the demand for coal due to the railroads and other industries using oil and gas, which has within the last two years reduced the output at least 50 per cent, has been one of the principal reasons for the depressed conditions existing at the present time.

"Further, a number of prospective purchasers, although responsible in every way, were unable to borrow funds to finance their intended purchases. A number of these have signified their intentions of making bids upon the mineral tracts desired as soon as financial arrangements can be made.

"It can not be expected that outside operators will come into Oklahoma and purchase mineral tracts with the intentions of opening new mines when they would have to face the unsatisfactory conditions now existing. However, a number of prominent men now operating mines in Oklahoma express their opinions that there were favorable indications of improvement which might come within a reasonable time.

"I do not think there should be a further effort made to offer for sale the coal and asphalt deposits until such time as it would be justified by a decided improvement in the present existing condition."

Subsequently bids from purchasers to buy three separate tracts at the appraised value were accepted.

In view of the conditions which have since existed relative to the coal and asphalt mining industry in Oklahoma, it has not been deemed advisable nor to the best interests of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations to offer during the past few years the tracts of the segregated coal and asphalt deposits for sale at public auction.

On September 25, 1928, the Franklin County Coal Co. filed a formal application for a 1-year option on the coal and asphalt deposits underlying certain tracts for the purpose of prospecting for coal and for the right to purchase, within the option period, upon certain terms and conditions set forth in the application the coal and asphalt deposits underlying said particular tracts.

In view of certain legal questions involved, the matter was taken up with the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior. A copy of the solicitor's opinion of November 19, 1928, relative to the matter is inclosed for your information. In view thereof the department declined to grant the application of the Franklin County Coal Co.

In view of the solicitor's opinion, it has been suggested that it might be to the best interests of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations if certain legislation might be obtained providing for the sale of the remainder of the segregated coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations and permitting the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion and under certain circumstances, to offer the tracts at either public auction or private sale at not less than the reappraised value, and to further provide that under certain circumstances he might grant options to purchase and grant to the party to whom such option might be given the right to prospect for coal and asphalt on the tracts covered by the option.

A copy of a draft of a bill setting forth the suggested legislation is inclosed for your further information. It may be said in regard thereto, however, that although the governor of the Chickasaw Nation is inclined to favor legislation along the line of the inclosed draft, the principal chief of the Choctaw Nation is opposed thereto.

It appears from your letter that you favor offering, during the present calendar year, for sale, after extensive advertising, the remaining tribal property of the Five Civilized Tribes, and especially the segregated coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations. In view of your letter, the matter of offering for sale at public auction at an early date said coal and asphalt deposits belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, and other tribal property of the Five Civilized Tribes, will be taken up with C. L. Ellis, district superintendent in charge of the Five Civilized Tribes Agency, and he will be requested to submit a full report in the matter, with his views and recommendations as to what action should be taken. Upon receipt of his report the matter will be carefully considered and such action taken looking to the offering of the tribal property for sale at the earliest practicable date consistent with the best interest of the above-named Indian nations.

Very truly yours,

ROY O. WEST.

I have added a third section to the proposed bill and introduced it on January 29, 1929, H. R. 16696, which provides for the sale of the remainder of the coal and asphalt deposits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes.

Section 1 of the bill authorizes the reappraisement of these deposits and their sale at not less than the reappraised value, to the highest bidder, at public auction, or at private sale at not less than the reappraised value, and in the event there is no sale it permits, for the reasons stated in the Secretary's letter, after the deposits have been twice or more offered for sale at public auction, that the Secretary may grant options for terms of not to exceed six months to prospective purchasers to go upon the land and make tests and borings, in the hope that they may be induced to become interested in the purchase of the areas explored.

The second section makes plain that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to further reappraise the tracts remaining unsold.

Section 3 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, after any tract has been duly advertised and has been offered for sale at public sale three times and twice reappraised, and remaining unsold, to again readvertise and sell at public auction to the highest bidder regardless of the last reappraised value, any tract remaining unsold, reserving to the Secretary of the Interior the right to reject any and all bids and the sales are subject to his final approval. This section contemplates the ultimate sale of these deposits. Every effort is to be made to secure the best possible price. The tribes are protected against the deposits being sold at too low a price by the proviso which is added reserving the right to the Secretary of the Interior to reject any and all bids, and requiring his final approval before any sale is consummated. The bill is short, easily understood, and is as follows:

A bill providing for the sale of the remainder of the coal and asphalt deposits in the segregated mineral land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to reappraise and sell, at not less than the reappraised value, to the highest bidder at public auction and under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, the remainder of the coal and asphalt deposits, leased or unleased, in the segregated mineral lands in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations, Oklahoma, and belonging to said Indian nations: Provided, however, That where any tract of said coal and asphalt deposits has been or may be offered for sale at two or more public auctions after due advertisement and no sale thereof was made, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and under such rules and regulations and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, sell such tract at either public auction or by private sale at not less than the reappraised value: Provided further, That, in the cases of tracts of the coal and asphalt deposits that have been offered twice or more for sale at public auction and no sale made, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as he may prescribe, grant options for terms of not to exceed six months to purchase such coal and asphalt deposits and renew and extend any such option for an additional term or terms of not to exceed six months, giving and granting the right to make such tests and borings as may be necessary to demonstrate the nature and extent of such mineral deposits.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior may, in cases where tracts remain unsold and the facts are found to justify, cause further reappraisement to be made of such tracts.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, and under such rules, regulations, terms, and conditions as he may prescribe, in cases where any such tract or tracts of coal and asphalt deposits, after due advertisement, have been three times offered at public sale, and have been twice reappraised and remain unsold, cause any such tract or tracts to be readvertised and sold at public sale to the highest bidder, regardless of the last reappraised value of any such tract or tracts: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall have the right to reject any and all bids and all sales shall be subject to his approval.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield there?

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall be glad to.

Mr. GARBER. Of course, the gentleman recognizes that we esteem him as one of the most capable and efficient representatives of the Indians of Oklahoma. I want to inquire whether or not his bill provides for exploration of the land before the bidding. Would it not be beneficial and advisable to permit an exploration before?

Mr. HASTINGS. If I did not make it clear in my remarks, I will say to my colleague that this bill does provide for that. Section 1 provides that it shall be offered at public sale and sold at not less than the appraised value. It provides for the reappraisement of the deposits. Then it provides that the deposits may be sold at private sale at not less than the appraised value, and it then authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to give permits to prospective purchasers to go on the various tracts and make explorations and such tests as they may see fit, which may be advantageous or helpful to them in deciding upon the amount of their next bid on any tract.

Mr. GARBER. These coal lands and asphalt lands are of great prospective value, are they not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. And in order to induce outside capital to come into the State and contribute toward the best price, would it not be advisable to permit of exploration before making a bid?

Mr. HASTINGS. The bill authorizes that to be done as provided in section 1.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. As a matter of fact, the rules and regulations of the Land Office and the Interior Department both permit of making these explorations.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Secretary refers to and incloses an opinion of the Assistant Attorney General of the department, which I have not inserted in the RECORD because of its length, holding that the department did not have that right under existing law, and for that reason asks for this additional authority.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. How many acres of that land remain unsold?

Mr. HASTINGS. The number of tracts sold and remaining to be sold will be found in the Secretary's reply. His letter states that there were 517 tracts and that of these 94 have been sold.

As stated in my letter to the Secretary of the Interior the first agreement made between the Choctaw and the Chickasaw Tribes and the United States, providing for the making of the rolls of these tribes, the allotment of their lands, and the winding up of their affairs, was made on April 23, 1897, almost 32 years ago. The rolls were completed and all of their lands allotted more than 20 years ago. Leases were made on a number of tracts covering these coal and asphalt deposits. Many of these leases have expired and all will expire within the next three years. A few years ago large royalties were received from them. The report of the Department of the Interior, under date of January 30, 1929, shows that there was received and placed to the credit of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes, as royalty from coal and asphalt deposits for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, $88,843.81, while the tribal expenses for the same period aggregated $97,728.26.

This clearly shows that the royalties are falling off and are not sufficient to pay the current tribal expenses.

Three solutions have been proposed for the disposition of these coal and asphalt deposits:

First. That they be sold to the Government of the United States at their appraised value. A bill to this effect has been introduced in the House but was adversely reported upon by the Department of the Interior, and everyone familiar with the situation knows that there is no hope of inducing the Government to buy these deposits inasmuch as within the last few years coal has been developed under large areas of land in the Western States, some of which are public lands still owned by the Government.

Second. It has been suggested that these deposits be sold to the State of Oklahoma. No proposition has been made on behalf of the State to buy them and none is expected to be made. The bill which I have introduced would permit either the Government of the United States or the State of Oklahoma to purchase any or all tracts covering these deposits.

The third and the only sure and practical way to dispose of these deposits is to sell them to the highest bidder after due advertisement and after every effort is made to get the very best possible price for the tribes. These deposits have been offered for sale some two or three times. Only a few tracts have been sold. Within the last few years oil and gas have been discovered under large areas throughout the South and West which come in competition with coal.

Since the final rolls were made it is estimated that more than one-third of the original allottees have died. The question of the determination of their heirs is becoming more complicated each year. The members of these tribes are entitled to have these coal and asphalt deposits sold to the very best advantage and they are entitled to have the proceeds thereof distributed among the enrolled members of the tribes.

In my judgment these deposits are not worth any more than the price for which they can be sold. Of course, I am anxious to get the greatest price possible, but surely everyone must appreciate that after these deposits have been offered three times at public sale and twice reappraised, and also offered at private sale, after prospective purchasers have been given the privilege of going upon the land and making tests, that every effort possible has been made to secure for these tribes the value of these deposits. If the members of these tribes had this money distributed among them per capita, it could be utilized to a splendid advantage in the improvement of their other lands, and in that way make them more valuable and productive. If a private estate had been delayed for 32 years in being wound up, the heirs would be entitled to complain against such an unreasonable delay. The members of these tribes are entitled to complain against the delays of Congress and the delays of the Department of the Interior in not taking the responsibility of selling these deposits after every effort has been made to secure for them all that they will bring after every precaution has been taken.

The interests of the members of these two tribes should, of course, be first considered and protected. The cities and towns contiguous to these deposits are vitally interested in their development. It would mean a larger population and more employment.

The counties in which these deposits are found and, in fact, the whole State are interested in having these deposits sold and developed, not only because the population of those sections would be increased but these properties would then be placed upon the tax duplicates and would aid in paying the local, county, and State expenses. Whether looked at from the standpoint of the members of the tribes or the citizenship of the community or from a State standpoint, every effort should be made to dispose of these coal and asphalt deposits.

At best it will require a few years—three to five—to dispose of them. In the meantime suits are being brought under the 1924 jurisdictional act in behalf of these tribes on all claims which they may have against the Government of the United States, and they should be determined within the time the coal and asphalt deposits are disposed of. When determined, and provided these coal and asphalt deposits are sold, the affairs of these two tribes should be completely wound up.

The responsibility is ours to prudently, cautiously, yet steadily, press these matters to their final solution. No one has offered any other solution; in fact, no one presses any solution. I have introduced this bill in the earnest hope that it may be enacted at an early day, believing that it will solve the question and will enable the department to dispose of these deposits, distribute the proceeds among the members of the tribes entitled to them, attract a larger population to the areas covered by these tracts, afford more employment to labor, place these coal and asphalt deposits upon the tax duplicates, and add to the general happiness and prosperity not only of the members of the tribes but the entire citizenship in the several counties in which these deposits are found and of the whole State. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when the proposal first came before us for Congress to delegate its power and authority to the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department to determine and say where new post-office buildings should be located in the United States, I was against it, because I did not believe that we could depend upon getting a distribution of same that would be fair to all sections entitled to buildings. And I did not believe that it would be wise for Congress thus to delegate its inherent power and authority.

For a number of years the Government has owned a desirable building site, both in Coleman and Sweetwater, Tex., both of which places are entitled to buildings. The post office at Sweetwater, Tex., last year paid a clear profit of over $30,000 to the Government above all expenses. As the patriotic and deserving citizens of these two cities had made sacrifices in helping the Government to obtain sites, I felt that they should be cared for first, and their two buildings together would cost only a small part of the appropriation demanded by a big city.

Prior to the time he moved to suspend the rules and pass S. 4663 authorizing an appropriation of $275,000,000 for public buildings the chairman of the committee [Mr. ELLIOTT] called me off in the Speaker's lobby and informed me that my opposition was unfounded, as my district was going to be taken care of, and that he was assured both by Mr. Wetmore, of the Treasury Department, and Governor Bartlett, of the Post Office Department, that provision would be made for my two cities. I told him that if they would be cared for I would gladly support the building program. He assured me that I could rely upon it.

I went to my good friend and colleague, Mr. LANHAM, who was the ranking Democrat on said committee, and he also verified the assurance that Mr. Wetmore and Governor Bartlett would provide my two buildings. And I then supported and helped to pass the program.

In moving to suspend the rules and pass S. 4663, Chairman ELLIOTT had only 20 minutes for debate, and though there are 21 members on his committee, he yielded to me, and from my remarks in the RECORD of February 7, 1927, I quote:

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, all of us have sense enough to know that this bill is going to pass and the money is going to be spent. One who does not believe is not posted. And inasmuch as my constituents are taxed with the other people of the United States to raise this money for post-office buildings, I want some of such buildings to be built in my district. And since this huge sum of money is to be spent, I want a proper proportion of it spent in my district.

* * * * * * *

The money will be spent. And I have been assured both by Governor Bartlett and Chief Architect Wetmore that if they can be allowed this additional money provided for in this bill, cities in my district that for years have been entitled to buildings, and some of which have had sites for years, would come within their program, and I feel that I have no right to vote in a way that would deprive my district of getting its proportion of the buildings to be constructed. If there were a substitute proposition here for us to designate the places where buildings are to be built, I would vote for it. But there is but one proposition before us under this motion to suspend the rules, and that is the bill before us, just as it is written, which must be voted up or down.

Self-preservation is the first law of nature. There has been a program arranged and agreed upon by the two departments and our committee whereby post offices of certain classes are going to be taken care of and given buildings. I am assured that certain cities in my district are going to come within that program and I am going to get what is coming to my district. Therefore I am going to vote for the bill. [Applause.]

I did not see either Mr. Wetmore or Governor Bartlett at that time, as Senator SHEPPARD and I had already had conferences with them about these buildings, and when I was assured by Chairman ELLIOTT and the ranking minority Member, Mr. LANHAM, that Mr. Wetmore and Governor Bartlett had assured them I would be cared for I accepted their statement, and deemed it an assurance from the departments. And said bill, S. 4663, was passed under suspension by the vote of 294 to 83.

Then the matter of authorizing the $250,000,000 in addition to the $25,000,000 provided for in section 3, came before the House again on December 17, 1927, when Chairman ELLIOTT moved to suspend the rules and pass H. R. 278, and from the debate that ensued I quote from the RECORD the following:

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When this legislation was up last year there were assurances made by Mr. Wetmore, of the Treasury Department, Governor Bartlett, in the Post Office Department, by the chairman of the committee [Mr. ELLIOTT], and the distinguished gentleman, as ranking minority member [Mr. LANHAM], to certain Congressmen with respect to a certain building program. May we rely on those assurances concerning this bill?

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to my colleague that any assurance I am able to give I hope any man can rely upon at any time. Under the existing policy of the law I have to rely, like everyone else, upon those who are in charge of the construction.

Mr. BLANTON. Some of us are relying on those selfsame promises. The assurance I have had from the four authorities mentioned that buildings would be constructed at Sweetwater and Coleman, Tex., on sites there which the Government has owned for years causes me to support this bill.

And during Mr. LANHAM's remarks, he was interrupted by one of our other colleagues from Texas, as follows:

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Relative to promises, my colleague is on the Public Buildings Committee, and he has watched the procedure. Have they not proceeded so far in pretty much of a businesslike manner? I did not get in under the wire myself, I will state to my colleague; but have they not proceeded in a businesslike way?

Mr. LANHAM. I think they have.

During the discussion of this measure, with only 20 minutes to the side, my distinguished colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, who ably represents the El Paso-San Angelo district, spoke for the bill, and I quote the following colloquy between him and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY], another ranking member on the committee, showing that in this debate it was recognized that my support of the measure was based upon assurances relied upon by me that provision would be made for my district:

Mr. HUDSPETH. * * * I want to say to my friend, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY], who is opposing this measure, that I tried through the old method—the one he advocates now—when I first came here and while this district was developing, to get some public buildings established. Some of the older Members advised me as follows: "Claude, introduce bills designating your places." Well, I introduced a bill to establish one, I think, in almost every county or town in my district having a population of over 2,000. I do not know of anybody who surpassed my speed limit in that respect except my colleague the gentleman from Texas, Judge BLANTON. He had one almost proposed in every precinct in his district, as I showed you here one day. [Laughter.] Of course, I am speaking somewhat facetiously as to Judge BLANTON'S bills, but he introduced quite a flock. I think he opposed this bill the last time while I voted for it. He has got a building at Sweetwater. Well, I am glad of it. I trust every colleague of mine who needs a building will get one—especially the Texas delegation. Some say the way to get you a building designated is to fight this bill. Well, I do not believe this, as I said to my colleague and friend FRITZ LANHAM to-day, and he agreed with me. The Building Committee—Mr. Schuneman, Governor Bartlett, Mr. Martin, and the architect Mr. Wetmore—I believe are trying to handle this matter in a business way and use business methods—they have a big problem, but I believe they will work it out fairly and squarely. They impress me as being fair men.

Mr. BUSBY. If the gentleman will permit, I want to correct him. The gentleman [Mr. BLANTON] did not oppose the bill. He simply opposed the proposition until he had promises for two places.

And that bill was passed under suspension of rules by the vote of 275 to 27.

I believe that Assistant Secretary Schuneman and Mr. Wetmore, of the Treasury Department, and Governor Bartlett, of the Post Office Department, will see to it that buildings are constructed in Sweetwater and Coleman. Both of these places deserve them. Both come within the requirements. It would be business economy to the Government to own its own buildings at these places. And I have faith in these departments giving these cities a square deal.

I would not have brought the matter up here had it not been for the fact that I am soon to retire from Congress. Were I to remain here, these departments would not be allowed to overlook the matter. But after I leave there might otherwise be a tendency to forget. So I am bringing the matter to their attention, and I am also letting the people of these two cities know the situation. They must not become impatient. And they should not bother other Congressmen who have their own problems. Only within the past fortnight the Board of City Development of Sweetwater sent telegrams and a personal representative to my colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, asking that he help them get their building. They did not realize that Mr. HUDSPETH is exhausting every possible means known to the ingenuity of man to get a building for Colorado and other deserving cities in his own district, and that during his 10 years of able, energetic, and efficient service here not one single post-office building has yet been constructed in his own district. And while he would gladly do anything within his power to help my district, and I would gladly do anything within my power to help his district, each of us is leaving no stone unturned in our efforts to get needed buildings for our district.

The deserving cities of Breckenridge, Ranger, Eastland, and Cisco in my district, are all entitled to buildings, and their enterprising citizens are going to take steps in the near future to help the Government acquire suitable sites, as they know this is a crucial and important step toward getting buildings.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my service in the House is soon to end. For 12 years I have given the very best that was in me, without stint, to the people of the country; not merely to the people of my district, but to the people of the United States whenever they called on me. I have done everything within my power to be of some service to the Nation. I do not believe in violating the Sabbath, but I have had to work some every Sabbath day since I have been in Congress for 12 years to keep up with the business of my office and with the demands made upon me. I have worked every holiday. I have never turned down the call of the ex-service man, and they have called on me, I think, from every State in the Union. I have one rule in my office that must not be disobeyed, and that is when an ex-service man calls on me for help, he gets it. I do not ask him where he lives, or ask him why he does not call on his own Congressman or Senator. I help him.

I am sorry to leave Congress, and am sorry to leave the association of the splendid colleagues I have had for 12 years. I am sorry to see my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] leave. He has been earnest and diligent. I am sorry to see my friend from Florida [Mr. SEARS] leave. He has been here rendering valuable service for 14 years.

It always will be a pleasant recollection to me that while I aspired to the Senate and was defeated, I helped to elect the able man who did succeed. There could not have been a chance for my election after the Houston convention. I knew it. The Houston convention spoke my death knell in my campaign, because all of my part of the country in the western half of Texas was against what was done at the Houston convention, and loyalty to my party forced me to support the nominee. But with my good friend and colleague in the House, TOM CONNALLY, and myself in the same race, we went through a heated campaign, lasting for several months, he on the stump speaking three or four times a day, and I on the stump speaking as many days, as many times, as he did, we went through that campaign as friends and there was not an unkind word said by me about him, nor by him about me, and when I was eliminated I had the pleasure of helping him to attain his ambition to go to the Senate. [Applause.] And he and I are still good friends, and he will have my hearty support in every endeavor he makes on the other side of the Capitol. [Applause.]

I want to thank all of you, my colleagues, for your patience in bearing with me. I have had to oppose many bills in which you were interested. I have blocked many of them. You could not understand it. You thought, may be, there was something personal in it. There was not. It was a report that I had had from some department to the effect that some bill ought not to pass. I gave every bill that I attempted to block careful consideration, and I had a report from some department against it when I took a stand against it. Possibly that helped to cause some of you to misunderstand me, but I did what I thought was my duty. I thank all of you at this time, and I wish all of you well. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not suppose there is any Member of the House who holds more divergent views from the gentleman from Texas than myself, but I want to say that, although he has been a strong fighter and at times an exuberant fighter, to my mind he has always been a fair fighter. [Applause.] I particularly want to thank him for a little favor he did me in my first term here. It was on this bill. I was fighting for an amendment. The amendment had evidently been carried, but not being acquainted with the parliamentary procedure, it was necessary for me to make another motion that I neglected to make. The Chair, in a whispered ruling, offset the effect of the vote, but the gentleman from Texas came to my rescue. He made the proper motion and saved the day for the amendment. I did not know him then as well as I know him now, and he did not know me, but I do not suppose that made any difference to him. I want to reiterate that I have never in a legislative hall met a man more fearless and more fair in debate in the advocacy of his own principles.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to read an excerpt from an article entitled "America and England," written by Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, in the Nation of January 30, 1929. He says, among other things:

It would be highly improper for me to pass any opinion on the new American cruiser program; if I did so, it would quite properly be resented. But I may be allowed, as an outsider who is greatly concerned with the moral authority which every great state must possess if we are to secure the conditions of a world's peace, to say that the execution of that program will be a great blow to the Nation from which the Kellogg pact originated.

It is edifying when America discusses increases in the Navy to have British statesmen preach disarmament for America. Their piety on these occasions outrages common decency. The apex in international hypocrisy has been reached by Mr.

Ramsay MacDonald. Why? Because it was this smug gentleman who completely unbalanced the formula of the Washington treaties.

It is no use dissembling the situation. We are building cruisers because Great Britain built cruisers. It was during the government of MacDonald that Great Britain started on its cruiser program that threatened our world position. Against the desire of his own Labor Party he added five cruisers to the British Navy, and it was this violation of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the Washington treaties that made Britain the pacemaker in the naval race. The responsibility for the British back-breaking naval race can be laid fairly at the door of our latest mentor, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

I do not doubt that he is for peace, providing that is a peace coupled with British superiority on the seven seas. The statement from the laborite marks a departure in British tactics. Formerly the war lords of the Admiralty used to censure our proposed naval construction; now the Admiralty has used pacifistic weal instead of the bulldog growl to halt our progress.

The morality of MacDonald is typical of the British. Away off in the recesses of the Einstein world there still reverberate the agonized cries, and there still flash the reflection of the innocent blood of victims in all parts of this universe of the British lust for supremacy. If history has a lesson, it is: Beware Great Britain preaching sermons.

In 1922 we, the leading Nation of the world, had the leading navy in the world. That was our right, and that was the fact. But such a navy was immediately burdensome on the American people, though it might be ultimately beneficial. That navy we reduced, and conceded a parity, contrary to precedent, to a country that was unequal economically to reach our high naval estate.

An analysis of the treaty reveals that even in the treaty navies we worked out an inferiority for this Nation. The British delegates saved the mighty Nelson and Rodney from the havoc of the treaty. This capital-ship advantage was not sufficient for the British Admiralty, and so Mr. MacDonald obliged the Admiralty with cruiser construction as he obliges them to-day with sanctimonious advice directed overseas. It is like a defendant advising the judge to go straight.

Our delegates exchanged our naval lead for the disruption of the British-Japanese alliance. That was no consideration. In addition, we agreed not to fortify the Pacific. The British and Japanese did openly abrogate the treaty. But a combination of British duplicity, oriental cunning, and the wireless can restore it. All that the dangerous treaty needs to give it life is a sharp spark of the radio from London to Tokyo.

The British are not as stupid as they look, and the Japanese are as wise as they look.

I do not agree with the too prevalent notion that Shaw has 95 per cent of the British brains. They are a poker-faced tribe. They sent some of their shrewdest card players to the Washington conference. We trusted them and swapped good steel chips for unredeemable I. U. S.'s. I fully believe that when I arrive at the underworld of the hereafter all the Plutonian imps will wear monocles and call it 'ell. They will rule the sulphur seas, too.

In view of the secret Franco-British proposals that Mr. Hearst exposed, it might be well to investigate the British-Japanese treaty to see whether it is dead or shamming. It is a strange circumstance that while the Japanese protested against our fortifying the Pacific, they have not against the proposed great naval construction of the British at Singapore. Moreover, it is well to understand that as the island empire of Britain built cruisers to protect itself, the island empire of Japan paralleled with the protection afforded by new fleet submarines. If the treaty were in existence Japanese submarines and British cruisers would go far toward filling out a joint fleet. Nor have the Japanese protested against the naval activities of Australia. At Geneva the Japanese threw the weight of their influence with the British.

Here is a book entitled "National Policy and Naval Strength," by Vice Admiral Richmond, of the British Navy. Speaking of events just prior to the war he points out that the Kaiser probably thought:

> He had disarmed Britain's Navy by the agreements arrived at concerning sea war.

I wonder if we, too, are too trustful of Great Britain's agreement on the Japanese alliance? I wonder if we, too, have too much faith in foreign diplomacy? I wonder if we, too, like Wilhelm the Second, are being misled by open statements?

The British are attacking our cruiser bill with the multilateral pact which renounces war as an instrument of national policy. The British war on a cooperative basis. They always have allies, and war is not renounced as an instrument of international policy. If the pact calls upon us to defeat the cruiser bill, surely it calls upon the British to borrow our scrapping machinery and to reduce their navy to the point where we are not second to it.

There is some concern about the time limit in the cruiser bill. In the clever hands of the chairman of this subcommittee the time limit will defer to the Budget. We have not appropriated for ships authorized 12 years ago; they are paper ships, if paper can last that long.

There is one solution in the naval situation; that is, build till they stop.

I suggest to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald that he look upon his own constituent, view the sleek admirals and sleeker statesmen, and, if he has time, the starving miners. Ask himself, then, if the nation that tolerates such inequalities is high-minded, and if his logic does not fail him, he will advise that the money available for the Admiralty be diverted to the salvation of his labor following. In the long run the United States will be happier if it takes its advice from the intelligent, rugged realist from Missouri, instead of from the apparent idealist, but actually selfish realist, Mr. MacDonald. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the House for a few minutes on a matter that has been pending before this body for some time and a matter that I consider highly important from the standpoint of the employees in the Government service, as well as to the Government itself. The matter I refer to is that of a bill pending, known as S. 1727, to amend the retirement act.

This bill has been on the calendar of the House for almost two sessions. It passed the Senate and was referred to our committee last session. The Civil Service Committee of the House reported it to the House unanimously on May 10, 1928. (Committee of the Whole House, Union Calendar, No. 495, Rept. No. 1580.)

A resolution was presented to the Rules Committee asking for a rule under which this bill might be considered and the Rules Committee voted the rule requested May 23, 1928. (House Calendar No. 478, Rept. No. 1827; Resolution No. 222.) That rule is still pending. The chairman of the Rules Committee has reported this resolution to the House, it is on the House Calendar, Resolution No. 222, and just why he does not call up the rule is a perplexing question to many Members of Congress, as well as to the inquiring public.

There is absolutely no question as to the merits of this proposed measure, and I can hardly believe that this body would allow the very small extra cost to the fund which is involved—less than one-half of 1 per cent—to interfere with a measure involving the welfare of so many thousands of people, especially when it is remembered that the fund available for the payment of annuities amounted to more than $103,000,000 last July and is constantly on the increase.

In order to give you some idea, Mr. Chairman, of the inaccuracies of some of the figures that have been submitted in regard to this particular legislation, I wish to call attention to the estimates of the fund and its future status that were submitted by the actuaries back in 1919 when the original bill, then in charge of Senator Sterling in the Senate and of Congressman LEHLBACH in the House, was under consideration. These figures set forth the estimated balance, year by year. There is also given the actual balance after the law was in operation. Up to July 3, 1926, when the last amendment to the retirement law was enacted by Congress, it was estimated in 1919 that there would be $12,757,500 in the fund; the actual amount on hand was $54,629,004.93. In 1927, while the estimated amount was $15,307,000, the actual fund on hand proved to be $68,336,760.95. And on July 1, 1928, although the estimate was $14,058,000, the actual amount on hand was $83,078,430, not including the Government appropriation of $19,950,000. These figures certainly prove that the actuaries' estimates were largely a matter of supposition on their part.

It is very evident, Mr. Chairman, that the amazing growth of this fund is astounding both to the actuaries and Members of Congress. The estimated cost by the actuaries has been so far in excess of the actual amount that the result is almost ridiculous. The contributions of 3½ per cent of the employees' salaries alone amount to more than $28,000,000 annually, and together with the Government's contribution of something like $20,000,000 there is an aggregate sum of almost $50,000,000 a year. The total expenditures during the past fiscal year amounted to less than $15,000,000.

While the House Civil Service Committee was holding hearings on the pending retirement legislation on January 14, 1926, one of the witnesses appearing at that time was Dr. A. H. Thompson, of the Pension Office, who was directly under the Commissioner of Pensions and had much to do with the adjudication of pension and retirement claims. To prove how this fund would grow from July 1, 1928, to July 1, 1941, he prepared a tabulated statement which I submit herewith for your attention. He estimates that by 1941 there would be a total contribution by the employees of nearly $175,000,000, including interest, over and above all expenditures. This amount, plus the Government's annual contribution of $19,950,000, would make an aggregate sum, including interest, of $537,332,944. In this connection it must be borne in mind that when these estimates were submitted it was anticipated that all expenditures would be paid out of the fund contributed by the employees.

Now, in order to show how these estimates would work out year by year, I am submitting Doctor Thompson's complete tabulation for the information of the Members of the House. There is also a table taken from the report of the Secretary of the Interior on the operation of the retirement law, showing the amount of employees' contribution each year, with interest, the amount which was begun to be appropriated in the last session of Congress with the interest thereon, the total expenditures, including annuities and refunds annually, and the balance on hand at the end of each fiscal year to July 1, 1928. There are some 405,000 employees in the Government service who come within the purview of the retirement law and the amount of their annual contribution into the retirement fund is more than $28,000,000, representing 3½ per cent of their salaries.

There are many retirement laws in this country of ours that are much more liberal than is proposed in this pending legislation; yet I shall not attempt to discuss the many systems in operation and their individual merits, but will briefly call attention to the retirement law in my own State, Massachusetts, which provides for voluntary retirement at age of 60 after 15 or more years of service; or, after 35 years of continuous service regardless of age. The annuity is one-half the retirant's final compensation. This law has been in operation for many years and in comparison with our present retirement law and even the proposed amendment, is much more liberal.

I understand from statements that have been given out regarding this legislation that the average annuity is something over $700 under our present law. Under the amendment which is now pending—and which I trust will soon become a law—the average would be raised to something like $800.

It has long been recognized by many of our most successful business enterprises that retirement of superannuated employees is a sound business proposition and numbers of these concerns pay the entire cost of annuity. If it is a good, conservative business proposition for large industries and other private enterprises of this country, then, aside, Mr. Chairman, from the humanitarian aspect of the question, would it not be, logically, a saving business proposition for our Government to treat its employees as well as or better than these business concerns? My own viewpoint would be that we should set an example in this matter as well as in all other matters pertaining to the welfare of the people.

Now, Mr. Chairman, surely this great Government of ours can not afford to allow a measure so important as this to be held up or postponed any longer. Think of the thousands upon thousands of employees who have given their lives' work to the Government and who have been retired under the provisions of the act of May 22, 1920, on annuities so inadequate that they barely provide existence! In fact, many of the annuities are so small that it is impossible to live on them. Outside assistance must be given.

I consider it my duty—and I feel sure that a majority of Members of Congress are in agreement with me—to insist that this matter be taken up and adjusted so that our Government may give evidence of its willingness to show a proper disposition toward the well-being of its employees.

With reference to the estimated small additional cost by reason of this pending bill, at the present time, owing to the enormous size of the fund in hand and its constant growth—as previously stated—it is not necessary for Congress to make any further appropriation nor will it be, from all indications, for years to come. It was eight years after the original law was enacted—May, 1920—before Congress began to appropriate for the fund, although, as a matter of fact, an appropriation sufficient to take care of the accrued liabilities ought to have been made at the beginning in order that interest might have been accumulating thereon; and while I will not say that it will be eight years hence before this matter is properly worked out, I do know that just now no further appropriation is necessary. In future years, if it is proved that additional cost warrants further appropriation, the matter can be taken care of at that time.

Mr. Chairman, may I ask this question of my colleagues: Is there any legislation pending before this body that is more urgent than this retirement bill? Is there any other measure that covers the material needs of such a large number of people and at the same time offers the Government so logical a business proposition? I feel sure that all of our Members are familiar with the intent of this proposed amendment and its remedial measures, and I urge the Republican leader and members of the steering committee of this body to request the chairman of the Committee on Rules to bring the measure before the House at once, that its Members may have the opportunity to discuss its merits and vote upon the bill. To refuse to do so is a defiance of the fundamental principles of representative government.

The tables referred to are as follows:

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Gladly.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman has stated the parliamentary situation with respect to this bill. How can it be called up for action?

Mr. DALLINGER. The chairman of the Committee on Rules can demand recognition from the Speaker at any time. The rule is on the House Calendar and it is Resolution No. 222.

Mr. GIBSON. Can anyone call it up except the chairman?

Mr. DALLINGER. No one except the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman has stated that there is an accumulation of $83,000,000 in this fund.

Mr. DALLINGER. It was over $100,000,000 last July.

Mr. GIBSON. Where does the $83,000,000 come from?

Mr. DALLINGER. The entire fund except the $19,000,000 that was in the appropriation bill last year comes from the employees.

Mr. GIBSON. Entirely?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes. As I understand it, when this matter was first proposed it was supposed to be a 50-50 proposition but as it stands to-day the Government is only standing 0.48 of 1 per cent of the cost and the employees are standing 3½ per cent.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman has stated there is some cost resting on the Government. Is there any offset against that in the way of a saving?

Mr. DALLINGER. It was estimated by the Bureau of Efficiency that the saving to the Government would be 6 per cent.

Mr. GIBSON. What is the ultimate cost to the Government on the percentage basis? It is something like 3.70 per cent, is it not?

Mr. DALLINGER. I think so.

Mr. GIBSON. And on that basis there will be an actual saving to the Government?

Mr. DALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. While in theory it would seem that only the chairman of the Committee on Rules could call this bill up for consideration, and it is generally conceded that if it is called up it will pass in five minutes——

Mr. DALLINGER. Absolutely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As a practical matter, if 40 Members will join with us, by invoking the rules of the House we can soon tie up all action in the House until this bill comes on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] has raised a very interesting question in his criticism of the leadership of the Republican Party in this House in failing to bring this very important retirement bill before the House for its consideration under the rule which was passed through the Rules Committee a good many months ago, and which is now on the Calendar of the House. I voted for the rule and favor the bill.

The gentleman from Massachusetts very correctly stated that if the chairman of the Rules Committee would see fit to do so, at any time, under the privileged status occupied by the rule, he could call it up in this House for consideration.

My friend from Massachusetts a few moments ago seemed to be seeking some real reasons why the chairman of his party's Rules Committee and the steering committee of the Republican Party in this House and those who are responsible for legislation under our system of government had failed to measure up to their pressing duty to bring this matter before the House for consideration. I think I can state to the gentleman from Massachusetts the reason the chairman of the Rules Committee has so far failed to act, although great pressure has been brought to bear against him.

I think if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], who is so deeply interested in this question, would go to the other end of the Avenue and consult with one of his fellow citizens from the State of Massachusetts by the name of Mr. Calvin Coolidge and could persuade that distinguished gentleman to give his consent to the consideration of the proposed bill that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the chairman of the Rules Committee, by the acquiescence of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], the chairman of the House committee, would get immediate action upon this proposition.

Reliable information has been published in the papers—and that is the only source of my information—that the real reason this legislation in which some 400,000 American employees are interested, together with their families, has not been taken up so far at this session of Congress is because the President of the United States has not as yet been convinced of the wisdom of that act; and I commend to my friend from Massachusetts this source for gratification of his curiosity as to why this bill is being delayed in the House of Representatives, and I urge him, if he is really anxious to find a solution of his problem and an answer to his question, that he make an appointment with the President of the United States.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if he believes everything he reads in the papers?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not believe everything I read in the papers; but I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, in turn, this question: Has the gentleman ever consulted with his fellow citizen from Massachusetts about this bill?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not consider it is any business of mine to do that. It is the business of the House of Representatives, not the President, to determine what it shall pass and what it shall not pass. After a bill is passed by the Congress, then it is the duty of the President to take the part that is given him by the Constitution—and not until then.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he is in a position to assert that the report published in the newspapers that the President is not satisfied with this bill and has so far been unwilling to give his consent to bringing it up is without justification?

Mr. DALLINGER. I do not know anything about it, Mr. Chairman, and I do not think it is incumbent upon the House of Representatives——

Mr. BANKHEAD. That being true——

Mr. DALLINGER. We are elected by the people to legislate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the Members, in their capacity as legislators, according to the information which I have been given, are being blocked at the request of the President of the United States, who is the head of the Republican Party; and he is the man who is responsible for the failure of the Republican leaders in this House to call up this bill for consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS].

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Chairman, we are very fortunate to-day in having in the gallery a very distinguished visitor to this House, a man who has reflected great glory upon the American merchant marine by reason of his exploits and more particularly by conduct of recent occurrence. It is a very great pleasure to me, as the Representative of his home city, the city in which he was born and brought up and where the members of his family are living at the present time, where he spent his boyhood days in the public schools, to have the privilege of presenting him to this House. We are proud of his distinguished achievements and of our distinguished visitor. We have every reason in this country to be proud of this splendid type and product of our merchant marine and of the great glory and credit he has reflected upon it. His exploits bring back to our minds the stories of the days of the vikings, and I think those of us who know that he comes from Scandinavian ancestry are warranted in believing that he has in his veins the true spirit and blood of the vikings.

Mr. Chairman, it gives me great pleasure to present to this House, Captain Fried, commander of the America. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL].

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, Indian affairs and the duty of the Government toward the Indians is a subject now attracting and receiving much attention from the Members of Congress. And well it should attract and receive their attention, because, in my judgment, the Government has not been discharging its duty to the Indians. Our Government is now more than 140 years of age; most of the time we have been functioning under our present Constitution. And yet the Government has never established and enunciated a well-defined policy of constitutional and legal duty toward the Indians. So it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is high time that the Congress should, by appropriate legislation, determine and enunciate its constitutional duties toward the Indians and their property, together with a well-defined program for the discharge of those duties.

The Constitution, in paragraph 3, section 8, Article I, provides that the Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes, as follows:

To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

The Supreme Court has defined the relationship between the Federal Government and the Indian tribes to be that of guardian to ward, and to be of a plenary character within those equitable relationships, as follows (5 Pet. 1):

* * * Meanwhile, they are in a state of pupilage. Their relations to the United States resemble that of a ward to his guardian; they look to our Government for protection; rely upon its kindness and its power; appeal to it for relief to their wants; and address the President as their Great Father.

The Secretary of the Interior has been charged with the management of Indian Affairs and with all matters arising out of Indian relations (sec. 463, Rev. Stat.). Congress has provided (sec. 681, the Compiled Statutes 1916):

There shall be in the Department of the Interior a Commissioner of Indian Affairs. * * * The Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior and agreeably to such regulations as the President may prescribe, have the management of all Indian affairs and all matters arising out of Indian relations.

The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs are charged by law with the duty of acting as the guardian of the property of the Indians and as the protector of their rights. (Quoting from West v. Hitchcock, 205 U. S. 85; Tiger v. Western Investment Co., 221 U. S. 316; see also 118 U. S. 375; U. S. v. Boyd, 68 Fed. 582; U. S. v. Freeman, 3 How. 556; U. S. v. McTanney, 7 Pet. 1; 26 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, 604; Booth's Opinion, August 2, 1922; Knight v. U. S. Land Association, 142 U. S. 161; Williams v. U. S., 138 U. S. 514; Miller v. Raun, 145 U. S. 200.)

Inasmuch as the Supreme Court has defined the relationship to be that of guardian to a ward, it is appropriate to understand the meaning of guardian, and also the duties of a guardian to his ward.

[Black's Law Dictionary]

Guardian: A guardian is a person lawfully invested with the power, and charged with the duty, of taking care of the person and managing the property and rights of another person, who, for some peculiarity of status or defect of age, understanding, or self-control, is considered incapable of administering his own affairs. (Bass v. Cook, 4 Port. (Ala.) 392; Sparhawk v. Allen, 21 N. H. 27; Burger v. Frakes, 67 Iowa, 460, 23 N. W. 746.)

A guardian is a person appointed to take care of the person or property of another. (Civ. Code Cal. sec. 236.)

One who legally has the care and management of the person or the estate, or both, of a child during its minority. (Reeve, Com. Rel. 311.)

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. Is it not true that in an unbroken line of decisions the courts have universally held that the relationship between the Federal Government and the Indians has been that of guardian and ward?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That is a fact. Now, up to about 1870 the Indians were dealt with by treaties through the Senate and the President. Since that time the Congress by joint resolutions and legislative enactment has dealt with the Indians. To proceed, we note there are two kinds of wards over which guardianships are placed. The most prominent type of ward is that of a minor, a child, prior to arriving at 21 years of age and development of capacity of understanding the duties and responsibilities in managing one's own person and property, together with the general duties of citizenship. In most State jurisdictions such period is fixed by law to be 21 years of age. The other type of ward is that of mental incompetency of a permanent character.

The Indians as wards of the Government, generally speaking, come under the type or class of the minor character existing between birth and the statutory fixed period of competency.

The Supreme Court describes this particular character of ward by saying that the Indians are in a state of pupilage. Pupilage is defined as—the state of being a scholar or under the care of an instructor for education and discipline. (Webster's International Dictionary.)

The Congress therefore is informed in a positive and uncontroversial way as to the character and type of wardship with which the Government has to deal as guardian.

Determining the Indians to be in a state of pupilage necessarily means that they are susceptible of being educated, trained, and developed into capable and responsible citizens, not only for the conduct and management of their own personal activities but to possess, manage, and control their property.

If the Government, as the guardian of the Indians, has in its possession and under its control the property of the Indians, as a guardian has possession and control of its ward's property, then a pertinent question arises as to the duties of the Government with reference to the property of its Indian wards who are declared to be in a state of pupilage.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is well recognized as a student of Indian affairs, is a member of the committee, and an excellent lawyer. May I inquire if it is not also a part of the law of guardianship toward a ward that the guardian must make an accounting of the property, and when the competency of the Indian is once legally determined, then should not that property be forthcoming? In other words, can the guardian appropriate or convert or otherwise jeopardize the property of his ward in any way?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion of what the law is, and I reply that all of the authorities upon domestic relations provide, and the law dictionaries define, the duties of a guardian concerning the property of a ward to be, to manage, conserve, and care for the property of the ward, and to make reports to the proper authorities concerning such property. And upon the arrival of the ward at the stage of mental development, responsibility, and capacity to manage his own business affairs, to deliver over to the ward's estate, together with accretions thereon.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in view of the provisions of the Constitution relative to the powers of Congress over Indian affairs, the decisions of the Supreme Court declaring the relationship of the Government to the Indians to be similar to those of guardian to a ward, and in further view of the enactments of Congress creating the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to be the agency of the Congress in the management of Indian affairs, both with reference to political and property rights, and with reference to the management of the property of Indians; there certainly can be little question as to our duties toward the individual Indians and toward their property. All we have to know are the duties of a guardian to a ward during his minority period and to discharge them, and to deliver to him all of his property upon his reaching his independence and majority. There are something like 200 tribes of Indians scattered about over the United States, composing altogether about 300,000 Indians. The big problem of their proper management is now before Congress. What shall we do with them?

Now, as to the further duty of the Congress toward the Indians, in my opinion, the Congress should declare, in view of its constitutional and legal duties, that it should furnish the necessary supply of means of support; of medical attention; of hospitalization; of sanitation; and of proper and suitable vocational and economic business education, including instruction and training concerning social relationships and duties as citizens to the various kinds of governments in the United States.

And to these ends normal training schools should be established, together with curriculum, for the proper education and training of teachers, school superintendents, and school faculties, to teach the younger members of the various Indian tribes the qualifications essential to independent, self-reliant, and capable citizenship.

It should further be declared to be the duty and purpose of the Government to deliver to each Indian within a certain period of time, when he should become qualified to manage, protect, and preserve his property, his or her property. Mr. Chairman, the Government's paramount duty toward the Indians is the qualifying of them for independent citizenship.

Its second duty to them is to manage, protect, and conserve their property until such time as they are capable of receiving it and then to deliver their property to them.

By pursuing this policy toward the Indians and their property the Government of the United States will be discharging its whole duty to the Indians, excepting, of course, those members who are too old or infirm to be taught to assume the duties and responsibilities of independent and capable citizenship; such Indians should continue wards of the Government, subject to the application of their own wealth to the cost of their maintenance.

The pursuing of such a policy 40 or 50 years will result in the emancipation of the Indians and the lifting from the Government a tax burden of many millions of dollars per year. And so, I recommend and urge the adoption by Congress of the policy suggested herein.

There is pending before the House, Mr. Chairman, a bill, H. R. 7204, which if passed and put into effect would, in my candid opinion, be in direct conflict with what, to me, is a positive and clear duty of the Government to the Indians with reference to them and the management of their property.

The bill would authorize an irresponsible, inexperienced, youthful Indian to enter into a trust contract for the permanent jeopardizing of his property while in such dependent and incapable age. Such a contract would determine irretrievably and unchangeably the beneficiaries of his estate; those who are to get the property, perhaps, after he is dead. The Indian with a long life, perhaps, before him, much of which it should be hoped would be as an independent, free, and capable citizen, would never be able to change the beneficiaries or get his property and use it.

If this bill should pass and the property of the Indians be disposed of in trust estates while the Indians are incompetents, in my opinion, such action would be in direct conflict with the duties of the Government in managing, conserving, and protecting their property and delivering it to them when they arrive at a period of competency. It prevents the Government discharging its duty to the Indians.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, in respect to approving these trusts, I am not going to go into it now. I expect to discuss it at some length next Wednesday. But I ask the gentleman to discuss this feature: Does this bill, H. R. 7204, change or modify in any respect the present authority of the Secretary under existing law to approve trusts? I assert that it does not, and I challenge any man to show that it does.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion, and agree with him that it may not enlarge the powers as to a certain class of contracts of incompetents. The present bill, H. R. 7204, does vest in the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs the power to even give away the property of the Indians.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will just yield again, I shall not interrupt him again.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I challenge that statement. Inasmuch as the gentleman has the floor in his own time and has plenty of time to discuss it, I challenge the statement of the gentleman from Kansas that there is any such language embodied in that bill. He can not put his finger on it. I think I know this bill. I have given it a great deal of study, and I do not think we ought to talk lightly about it. We ought to talk to the point in making a statement, but I suggest that we ought to be able to put our finger on the language that carries out such a statement. It is not in the bill.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The bill provides, as I remember it, that the Secretary of the Interior has the power to approve trust agreements with any restricted Indian over 21 years of age.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is right.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. And there are, so far as I remember, no exceptions.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman mean to say that section 1 of that bill would permit the Secretary of the Interior to approve a trust made by a mentally incompetent Indian? Surely the gentleman is too good a lawyer to do that.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The mentally incompetent Indian is not excepted in the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman is too good a lawyer, after having made a careful study of that question, to say that. I ask him if it is his opinion that under that section the Secretary of the Interior would have the power to approve a trust not of a restricted Indian, but one who has been adjudged mentally incompetent? It is unthinkable that my good friend from Kansas would make such a statement.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Oklahoma that Congress has exclusive jurisdiction over the Indian affairs, and if a law is enacted authorizing the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to approve any trust contract made by any incompetent Indian over 21 years of age, then certainly such act would warrant the conclusion that the Congress had meant what it said; and that if Congress had meant to except an Indian under guardianship or a mentally incompetent from making trust agreements, then certainly such exception would have been made in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. In the Jackson Barnett case the court held that $550,000 was given away from an incompetent restricted Indian, but that the act was void. At that time there was no special or general law authorizing the making of trust estates urged by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, except the general law to manage Indian affairs. Notice carefully what Mr. Burke says concerning the purpose of this bill, H. R. 7204. I wish to say further that one of the originators of the bill, one of the proponents of the bill, has said deliberately that he sought to secure the authority, which the United States courts have held that he did not have, to approve contracts of incompetence. He said he was seeking authority to do what the Federal courts said he did not have the right to do. I quote from his statement:

TESTIMONY OF COMMISSIONER BURKE AT COMMITTEE HEARINGS ON H. R. 7204

I had occasion to have something to do with a case that has attracted a great deal of attention throughout the country, due to misunderstanding and much misrepresentation, involving the estate of one Jackson Barnett. I think you have all heard about it.

At that time there arose an agitation over the Barnett case and through propaganda and misrepresentation, there was finally litigation begun to set aside the trusts created by Jackson Barnett on the ground that he did not have mental capacity to make a trust, and that the Secretary of the Interior did not have the power under the law to approve such a transaction. Even the Department of Justice intervened in that case with the plaintiff, who is an alleged next friend who represents a syndicate in Oklahoma that have contracts with alleged heirs of Jackson Barnett, that of whatever money they may receive from Barnett's estate upon his death they are to receive not less than 30 nor more than 50 per cent. The suit was tried in the United States Court in the Southern District of New York. The court sustained the theory of the plaintiff and held that Jackson Barnett did not have sufficient mental capacity to understand what he was doing when he made that distribution of his estate by the execution of the trust agreement, and therefore that the secretary could not approve it. That case is now on appeal to the Court of Appeals; that is, from the decision of the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, and probably may eventually go to the Supreme Court.

Mr. LETTS. When was that decision rendered?

Mr. BURKE. Last August, 1927; a few months ago. In passing I will say for the information of this committee and anybody else that is interested, that in my opinion an incompetent Indian is incompetent and there is no such thing as a competent, incompetent Indian.

There may be differences in degree as to their intelligence, but I will make this statement without fear of contradiction: That any person in whom an Indian has any confidence whatsoever, an incompetent Indian, that that friend will get his thumb mark to any instruments that he attempts to get if he is of the generation of Jackson Barnett, uneducated, ignorant, with no business experience. They are all more or less alike; and I will say this to the committee, because it is true, and Judge Standeven will support it, that in a number of contracts that came up here from Oklahoma, and there were several, for trusts executed by an Indian, in one instance, in the presence of the superintendent when he was interrogated and before he executed the trust, and that in more than one-half of those cases, we received telegrams or letters from the Indian repudiating them almost as soon as the contracts reached Washington, and just as soon as word went back that we had that information from the Indian, we got another telegram or letter from him and he was on again. It was a case of off again, on again, gone again.

That is the Indian, and so when you say that an Indian who is incompetent, must do something, must initiate something, it is contrary to any theory of the law that I know anything about, that any incompetent person can legally do something. He is incompetent because he can not do it, and it is for the Secretary of the Interior to determine whether such an Indian who does do something has sufficient intelligence to understand it, and his action and decision is conclusive and can not be reviewed by any court. That is our theory of the law, and that is the legal question involved in the Jackson Barnett case.

After this question of law was raised and we began to give the subject more study, we discovered that the method of making the trust was that the restrictions were removed from the funds and upon approval of the trust——

With that situation, we concluded if we are to continue allowing Indians to enter into such contracts, we ought to have legislation authorizing it, first, because there has been a question raised in the Barnett case as to the authority of the Secretary of the Interior to do it. That is the first question. Second, that we should find a way to take away any incentive to set trusts aside, and so this bill provides that in the event the trust is set aside for any reason, the money will revert back to the custody of the Secretary of the Interior; therefore there would not be any inducement for anyone to institute proceedings or get the Indian to institute proceedings to have it set aside.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course I am not responsible for any loose talk that anyone may make with reference to what they think about a bill. But I want to challenge the gentleman to read closely the language of section 1 of that bill, H. R. 7204, and he will find that it only permits the making of these trust agreements, and of course that must be construed in no other way than by the competent Indians.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The gentleman can place his own construction upon it; but the Supreme Court in construing these powers is not expected to presume that an exception is meant. It will be governed by the clear language of the act.

The common rule of law laid down in all of the works on statutory construction and interpretation say that when the wording of a statute is clear and unmistakable, it is presumed that the legislative body meant and intended to do and say what such construction of the statute clearly indicated. I cite Lewis's Sutherland on statutory construction:

> The statute itself furnishes the best means of its own exposition; and if the intent of the act can be clearly ascertained from a reading of its provisions, and all its parts may be brought into harmony therewith, that intent will prevail without resorting to other aid for construction.

Now, in view of the fact that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs has approved just the kind of a contract that we are speaking about, one of an Indian altogether incompetent, by which his property was given away, the courts have held that in such a case the contract was void; that Congress had not at any time given the same kind of authority which is sought in this case.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then why does not the gentleman offer an amendment to that section?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Because I have no doubt about it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Neither have I.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I do not have any doubt about it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Has the gentleman ever offered that sort of an amendment?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Because I am opposed to the bill. I am opposed to any power being vested in any officer which authorizes him to do the extreme opposite of his duty.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I do.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say to the gentleman here and now that this bill has been fully discussed and has been before the Committee on Indian Affairs a long time, and this is the first time I ever heard that objection raised against this bill, or that kind of an interpretation attempted to be placed upon that bill.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. The argument I have heard from others against this bill, which I hoped the gentleman from Kansas would touch on, is relative to the construction of the Oklahoma law in regard to trusts; institutions which may take trust funds and care for the Indians. The letters that have come on our desks from associations apparently have the Indian in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has again expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ARENTZ. Those letters have laid particular stress upon the fact that the State of Oklahoma does not protect its own citizens in the safeguards that it places about trust companies.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have never heard of any criticism in the State of Oklahoma along the lines mentioned by the gentleman from Nevada. I am sure the gentleman can point his finger to no case where the interests of all citizens have not been protected under our trust laws.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. Can the gentleman from Nevada point out in what direction the literature he has referred to calls his attention to the defects of the trust laws of Oklahoma?

Mr. ARENTZ. No; I can not exactly do that.

Mr. GARBER. I want to assure the gentleman from Nevada that the trust laws of the State of Oklahoma have been very carefully drawn. They have worn well and they have been interpreted repeatedly by the supreme court of the State. They are not loosely drawn and they safeguard and protect in every particular the trust estate.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I merely referred to the provisions of the trust law to illustrate what I considered to be a disregard of our duties as the guardian of a people who are in a state of tutelage.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman know that under the present law the Secretary of the Interior can do everything provided for in House bill 7204 and has done it, and that the only reason or necessity for House bill 7204 is that now when he turns the money of the Indian loose, it is loose forever? But, under 7204 we propose, at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, to throw a safeguard around the trust created afterwards by providing that should the trust fail the money goes back restricted and under the supervision of the Government. In other words, it remains restricted at all times, and that is why the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs ask Congress for this measure.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have no doubt that the gentleman's apprehension over 7204 is based largely upon the observations he made with respect to the administration of the estates of Osages which were in the hands of guardians in that State.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No, indeed. They are based on my judgment as to our duties to the Indians. When an Indian ward arrives at the state of competency I can not feel that the Government should be unable to deliver him his money, and I can not conceive of such situation as being in harmony with our duty as guardian, because in every State all over the country, and everywhere, there is nothing else required of a guardian upon the arrival of the ward at competency than to deliver him his money. As this bill provides that it can not be done, we can not discharge our duty as guardian of the Indians. That is an impossibility.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman understand that under this measure our ward, the Indian, has a right to direct the trust and where it shall go, not only to himself but to his beneficiaries?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No; I do not understand that, because of the state of mind and state of incapacity of the ward. He would not be a ward if he were more than 21 years of age and were not incapable.

Think of a young Indian man or young Indian woman, restricted and incompetent, with immature mind and incapacity, being asked by some big trust company to create a trust estate, by the officer or agent of a big trust company. In reality, who would be the originator of the idea? Who would prepare the terms of the trust agreement? We suggest that the idea would be originated by the trust company officials and the agreement would be drawn by the trust company officials. They would virtually constitute both parties to the agreement.

The trust agreement of Mollie Davis, a restricted and incompetent Creek Indian woman, not only provides for the unchangeable alienation of her $300,000 during her lifetime but undertakes to vest the same in certain beneficiaries who will take over the property after her death. Is it conceivable that a young, restricted, and incompetent Indian, perhaps unmarried, could make a satisfactory designation of beneficiaries to take over his estate after his death, many years, possibly, in the future, and always be satisfied, never desiring to change his beneficiaries? Such a thing is unthinkable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The big trust company of Oklahoma has been represented by strong lobbies in the last two sessions of Congress, urging the passage of H. R. 7204. It is interesting to note that these two large institutions, the Exchange Trust Co. and the Exchange National Bank of Tulsa, have been closely associated with the Sinclair interests and certain Standard Oil subsidiaries who have been recently involved in litigation with the Government over the Government's oil reserves. It is further interesting to note that in those big lawsuits the Government was successful in recovering back the oil leases and property valued at many millions of dollars.

The amount of the Indian moneys which would be available to this big trust company and others, should this legislation pass, would be from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000, to be involved in trust agreements with young and immature minds, which agreement shall extend for years after the Indians die. That is the kind of a bill it is; and while the Indians may be easily influenced, and are in need of money, it is intended to let the big trust companies influence them to sign such trust-estate agreements.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to ask the gentleman if he can point to a single line in this bill that gives any new authority to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I could; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will repeat the question. I want to ask the gentleman if he can point to a single line in this bill which permits the Secretary of the Interior to approve a trust which he does not already have under existing law. I state there is not, and I state further, that all this bill does, in the event that one of these trusts is declared illegal, is to cause the money or property to be brought back under the direction and supervision of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. In the first place, I do not think there is any law authorizing him to approve trust agreements. In the second place, I think if there was such a law there would not be such a tremendous lobby from the big oil bank of Tulsa here trying to get this bill enacted.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, let us answer the argument. I want to know if this changes the existing law in that respect.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I do not think it does. It makes no amendments of another act, so far as I know. It is a new law.

Mr. HASTINGS. That answers the question.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. The Secretary of the Interior under the present law, I am sure, has the authority to invest restricted Indians' money in nontaxable Government bonds, municipal bonds, first real-estate mortgages, not to exceed 50 per cent of the value of the property, and other securities; but I do not know of any law, general or special, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to authorize and approve the creation of Indian trust-estate agreements. If there is any such act of Congress, I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 16714, the Navy appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. R. 6864. An act to authorize the Postmaster General to require steamship companies to carry the mail when tendered;

The SPEAKER announced his signature to a joint resolution of the Senate of the following title:

S. J. Res. 171. Joint resolution granting the consent of Congress to the city of New York to enter upon certain United States property for the purpose of constructing a rapid-transit railway.

SENATE

MONDAY, February 4, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God of all grace and love, who hast filled the world with beauty, open our eyes, we beseech Thee, that we may behold Thy gracious hand in all Thy works in earth and sea and sky. Thou hast hallowed by love our homes, wherein we find joy to heighten our life and mirth to refresh us in our work; and because we are weak and dependent give unto us the gladsome help of Thy loving-kindness. Open our hearts that we may share the faith Thou hast revealed in Thy Son until the littleness of our knowledge is lost in the greatness of Thy love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: As women voters in New York City, ever since the vote was granted to women, we, the undersigned hereby wish to express our views in regard to the important matter of the building of cruisers by the United States.

We are most emphatically in favor of the unqualified protection of our own country—first and foremost, and in every way possible, and consider the building of these cruisers a safeguard which we should take immediate steps to procure. There should be no delay, and we urge you to work to secure the passage of the bill in favor.

Many who oppose the construction are more interested in other countries than they are in the United States, and many others are not well informed, although they mean well.

Respectfully yours,

WENONA P. MARLIN,

ALTHEA EWING,

RESTRICTION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I present a resolution adopted by the main body of the Immigration Restriction League on January 25, 1929, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

I also ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the committee an article from the Saturday Evening Post of January 4, 1929, entitled "Shut the Back Door"; and another article from the Saturday Evening Post of November 24, 1928, entitled "Time to Put Up the Bars." Both articles refer to my bill to place Mexico under the quota as other countries are now required by the law restricting immigration. The Legislature of Oregon recently unanimously passed resolutions urging the passage of my measure.

There being no objection, the resolution and magazine articles were referred to the Committee on Immigration and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Senate Joint Resolution 192, introduced by Senator NYE, provides for a further postponement of one year in putting into effect the national origins clause of the immigration act of 1920 by which the inequalities in the quotas of certain countries determined on the 1890 foreign-born census basis are removed so that our immigration is apportioned fairly in accordance with the number of people in our present population of each national origin; and

Whereas said national origins provision is a fundamental part of the system of quota restriction adopted by Congress in 1924, and further delay in putting the same into effect amounts to repudiation of our whole present system of restriction:

Resolved by the main body of the Immigration Restriction League (Inc.), at a regular meeting held on the 25th day of January, 1929, That said Senate Joint Resolution 192 is against the public interest and should not be enacted into law.

I hereby certify that the above is a true copy of a resolution passed by the main body of the Immigration Restriction League (Inc.) on the 25th day of January, 1929.

WM. L. RAU,
Secretary Main Body Immigration Restriction League (Inc.).

[From the Saturday Evening Post, November 24, 1928]

TIME TO PUT UP THE BARS

It is not without show of reason that the country is asking how much longer we are going to defer putting the Mexican Indian under the quota law we have established for Europe. According to the Immigration Study Commission, of Sacramento, in a single recent week 322 motor cars filled with Mexican laborers and their families passed northward over a single highway in southern California. Hosts of others swarmed in over other roads and large bands entered in carload lots by rail.

The commission computes that if a local American farmer has 3 children he is likely to have 27 great-grandchildren. Mexican laborers often have 9 children, or even more. At the 9-child rate, any of these Mexicans who are coming in by the trainload might be expected to average 729 great-grandchildren. It requires no imagination to estimate the overwhelming competition for jobs that the white American's great-grandchildren will be up against.

No temporary considerations of expediency should carry the smallest weight in preventing the proper economic protection of our own flesh and blood.

[From the Saturday Evening Post, January 4, 1929]

SHUT THE BACK DOOR!

The people of the southwestern border States who are making a determined but rather ineffectual fight to shut out the hordes who are swarming into the country from Mexico deserve the hearty support of the rest of the country. Their protests against this uncontrolled immigration are based not upon theoretical considerations but upon actual conditions under which they have to live and which they can not avoid without pulling up stakes and moving to some other part of the country. Their letters tell of able-bodied Americans who are out of employment because they can not subsist and decently rear two or three children upon the wages on which Mexican laborers can live contentedly and bring up seven or eight youngsters. They complain of the unwarranted burden put upon them in maintaining poorhouses, asylums, and correctional institutions for some of these unwelcome guests.

It would seem as if the justice of their cause and the serious character of the situation with which they are trying to cope would enlist the sympathy of the whole country and bring speedy relief. In the past, at least, these things have been too much to hope for. Those who seek relief are plain, everyday, small-town Americans who lack organization and influence, who do not know how to take their own part in this particular sort of fight and who therefore remain rather inarticulate and ineffective. Opposed to them are employers of cheap labor, both private and corporate, who are well organized.

These people of the border are not taking their troubles lying down. They react to them quite as strongly as they ought to, but they are not reacting along effective lines. Various civic bodies in the Southwest are hearing from them. Many letters of protest come to this office. But, after all, neither civic societies nor magazines are intrusted with the making of our national laws, and the efforts which should be focused upon Congressmen, Senators, and members of the Immigration Committees of both Houses are largely dissipated.

Congress has a great deal to do and only a few weeks in which to do it, but no more pressing duty confronts it than that of slamming the back door of the country and shooting the bolt.
